Differences in Sunday eucharistic celebrations between the Orthodox Byzantine churches and the Catholic ones in the U.S. show that the Orthodox tend to use choirs while the Byzantine Catholics have relied mostly on cantors who would lead the people in singing the liturgical prayers. The strong presence of Russian Orthodox churches in the U.S., along with a major seminary and publishing press (St. Vladimir's) as well as other Orthodox seminaries, have helped further establish this Byzantine tradition and make it known and better understood. Some considerations towards further church renewal have been suggested by a limited few on both the Orthodox and the Catholic sides. Among these have been the creative use of the iconostasis in liturgical celebrations, the readmitting of children's communion after baptism for Catholic Byzantine churches, and a greater liturgical participation by all. However there are no major changes planned or expected on either side.

The Armenian Catholics

There is a strong national and ecumenical affiliation between Catholic and Orthodox Armenians (as well as the few Protestant ones) with a common sense of being united as one ethnic and Christian people. The co-suffering of the Armenians under persecutions in this century has strengthened their sense of affiliation and communion. On the Catholic side this sense of unity is expressed in terms of liturgical conformity with the Orthodox. Other ways in which Armenians have shown their sense of unity is through their social clubs and schools which welcome all Armenians and even share in a common religious education. Memories of persecution as well as recent suffering and the earthquake tragedy of the Armenians in Russia have brought the parties into even greater national and spiritual communion. The Mass, as in the Orthodox liturgy, is still celebrated in classical Armenian. However some adaptations and abbreviations have been made, e.g., at the liturgy of the word the scriptures may be read in modern Armenian and so are the sermons in the vernacular to facilitate understanding. In the U.S. preaching is done sometimes in English along with modern Armenian. Most Roman introductory prayers and insertions were dropped after the Second Vatican Council. Thus the present form of the Catholic Armenian Sunday liturgy is in conformity with the Orthodox with the only differences being of brevity in some places.

The Copts

The Copts of Egypt constitute a sizable majority among the Christians in the Middle East. Most of these are Orthodox with a small minority of Catholic Copts. There is also a sizable number of immigrant Copts in the West (in the U.S. the Orthodox have thirty five churches). It would be best to describe liturgical developments in this rite primarily in terms of lingual adaptations for the benefit of the new multi-lingual congregations emerging today. In Egypt the Sunday eucharist is celebrated in Coptic and Arabic while in the U.S. it is a tri-lingual celebration in Coptic, Arabic, and English. The celebration lasts more than three hours. The fewer in number Catholic Copts celebrate the same liturgy but in a more abbreviated form.

Summary Observations

It would be reasonable to conclude from the above observations that long-term planning is necessary and even essential for a worthy process of liturgical reform and renewal for the Eastern churches. When a clear outlook to the future is lacking, the liturgical process becomes lost in its direction and many "band-aid" solutions to keep up with the times begin to emerge. These temporary solutions, often in the form of improvisations, do not draw properly on the riches of that church's tradition nor do they adequately meet the spiritual needs of the faithful. It would be of great importance that Eastern Catholic bishops work collaboratively to insure that this process continues to perform adequately over the years with frequent consultations with the laity. Since many of the Eastern churches today experience themselves as over-extended minority communities around the world, the interest, support, and cooperation of local Latin rite churches would be valuable in helping these Eastern Christian communities to value and share their heritage.

The Maronite Liturgical Year, Vols. 1-3 (Diocese of St. Maron, U.S.A., 1983). J. Madey, "The Reform of the Liturgy of the Syro-Malabar Church and the Holy See of Rome," Ostkirchliche Studien, 30, (1981): 130-168. R. Taft, "The Question of Infant Baptism in the Byzantine Catholic Churches of the U.S.A." Diakonia 3:3, (1982): 201-214.

STEPHEN BONIAN, S.J.

REFORM, LITURGICAL, IN REFORMATION CHURCHES

To describe the diverse worship practices of the many and varied Reformation churches is almost beyond possibility. Lutherans, Presbyterians, Methodists, Anglicans, Congregationalists, Pentecostals, the Society of Friends, and Baptists are only some of the multiplicity of denominations and sects that were spawned by the Reformation and various revivals and splits since. An acknowledgment of diversity, then, is perhaps the first thing that has to be said about these churches before proceeding to talk about liturgical reform. The possibility of such diversity appears to have been a fundamental characteristic of the Reformation challenge to the authority of the Roman Catholic church in the 16th century.

A preliminary look at liturgical reform in the 20th century, however, reveals a movement, not toward greater diversity, but rather toward ecumenical convergence in liturgy. This is seen in such achievements as the World Council of Churches' document on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, with its accompanying consensus eucharistic service, the Lima liturgy. The convergence extends to almost all areas of liturgy, including the eucharist, Christian initiation, calendar and lectionary, daily prayer and other services such as ordination, marriage, funeral and a wide range of pastoral liturgies. A new generation of services has been emerging among the churches in the decades of the 1970s and 1980s that have in common a reform of worship in all these areas.

This convergence is far from being only a Protestant phenomenon. Much of its impetus has come from the liturgical movement in the Roman Catholic church earlier in this century that bore remarkable fruit in the Second Vatican Council. The reform also reaches out to embrace with new appreciation the worship of the Orthodox churches. And now new sources of challenge and renewal beyond the traditions of the West are emerging globally from newer churches in Asia and Africa. There is also an increasing knowledge and appreciation of worship in other religions which were at one time dismissed as heathen. Furthermore, new voices calling for reform are emerging nearer at hand from the poor, the oppressed and the generally disregarded ones in our midst, including women, native peoples, disabled persons, homosexuals, and so on.

The picture is exceedingly vast and difficult to comprehend. But we have still been looking only at the movement of ecumenical convergence that is happening primarily among those churches which are usually characterized as being more "liturgical" or "mainstream." Other churches, which have identified themselves as "evangelical," "fundamentalist," or "charismatic," have not participated as yet to any great extent in the ecumenical convergence. They indeed would probably regard their freedom for diversity to be truer to the Protestant ethos than is the movement of convergence.

The convergence in the mainstream churches, however, is not simply a recovery of a pre-Reformation uniformity. It is rather toward a unity that can embrace difference and indeed encourages new and creative responses in liturgy through the charismatic and artistic gifts of the people. This openness is clearly indicated in the rubrics of many of the new service books. They ask their users, not merely to follow a prescribed liturgy, but to use the contents of the books—the prayers, responses, symbolic actions—as resources and samples to assist and guide the people's own work and initiatives in liturgy.

This recovery of the people's participation in the liturgy is profoundly in keeping with the Reformation insistence on the priesthood of all believers. The Reformers sought to render the liturgy accessible to all the people through such means as translation of the liturgical texts into the vernacular and the encouragement of congregational singing of psalms, hymns and canticles. The recovery of the notion of the whole people of God as celebrants in liturgy may indeed be one of the greatest contributions of the Reformation to the modern climate of liturgical renewal. This remains a goal even if history has shown it to unleash factions that disrupt the unity of Christ's body.

I have identified convergence as a primary characteristic of the current movements of liturgical reform among the churches, Reformed, Orthodox and Catholic. We need to consider what is at the root of this convergence and whether there is anything in the legacy of the Reformation, despite the diversity it unleashed, that has contributed to it. The modern liturgical convergence, I would maintain, has its source in a recovery of the biblical basis for Christian prayer and praise. The biblical witness to the saving acts of God in covenant with the people of Israel and culminating in the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ is the source non pareil of the Christian enactment of faith in the liturgy. Christians see all the events of their lives in the light of God's illuminating word, proclaimed and enacted in the liturgy. Our own stories, as is commonly said, belong in the larger context of the biblical story, and, together, these are celebrated week-by-week in the liturgy.

A unique place was given to the scriptures as the primary authority for faith and worship in the Reformation principle of sola scriptura. The scripture principle was enunciated by the Reformers in their conflict with the teaching authority of the Roman church with its claim of equality with the authority of scripture. Whether that is a correct reading of the Catholic understanding of authority does not need to concern us here. Of continuing importance is the Reformers' efforts to restore the Bible to the people and to reaffirm its authority for all matters of faith and life. But the scripture principle did not ensure unity among the Reformation churches. Many of the churches differed in how they understood sola scriptura. Some, like the Puritans, maintained that worship ought to consist only of that which is directly authorized by the scriptures. The consequence of the strict application of this criterion to worship was a drastic reduction of ceremonial practices and a focusing almost exclusively on the scriptures read and preached, and on prayer. Other churches of the Reformation, including those that followed Luther and Calvin most closely, regarded sola scriptura not as eliminating all other sources for liturgy, but rather placing scripture in the position of being without equal beside all other sources. Both Luther and Calvin appealed often, for example, to the authority of the primitive churches and the church fathers. Their study of both the scriptures and the early church led them to advocate a weekly celebration of the eucharist with both bread and wine distributed among the people.

Whereas the Reformers are noted for their efforts to restore the scriptures to the people, it is less known that they sought, albeit unsuccessfully, to do the same for the sacraments. Calvin's efforts to establish the eucharist every Sunday in Geneva, for example, were stymied by a ruling of the city magistrates, who favored the practice of four times a year that was already the rule in Zwingli's church in Zurich. This rule has been, with some exceptions, the practice in most Reformation churches until the recent liturgical reform. Perhaps the failure of the Reformation to restore fully the sacraments has to be understood in relation to their application of the scripture principle. Whether sola scriptura was applied strictly or more broadly, it served to cleanse the liturgy of what the Reformers regarded as human inventions and accretions. Only baptism and the Lord's Supper, for example, of the seven sacraments designated by the church of the Middle Ages, had the required dominical institution for acceptance as sacraments in the Reformation churches.

In the eucharist Luther also almost totally eliminated the Roman canon because of its unbiblical emphasis on sacrifice. His objections to the sacrifice of the Mass were not, it has to be said, against the notion of sacrifice itself. According to his understanding, to make the Mass into a sacrifice that could be repeated was a denial of what God had done once-for-all in the sacrifice of Christ. The biblical notion of justification by faith in this once-for-all sacrifice of Christ became a criterion for rejecting any worship that became a pious work rather than a response in thanksgiving to God's work of grace. The Reformers regarded much of the ceremonial practices and private acts of devotion in the Roman church as pious works designed to win God's favor rather than to express joyful thanksgiving for that favor already bestowed. This Reformation insight into the biblical doctrine of grace has had immense significance for the modern understanding of true motivation for prayer and worship.

The Reformers, however, did not recover, as the modern churches in their eucharistic renewal have, the biblical understanding of berakah, or blessing God, as an act of praise for God's saving acts. The worship of the Reformation churches tended to retain the penitential note of medieval piety. To that they added a strong note of moral exhortation and didacticism, partly because of the emphasis on word as opposed to symbol and ritual. The Hebrew understanding of berakah was missed by the Reformers, largely because the scriptures were not fully accessible to them in their attempts to reform the liturgy. Greater accessibility has come only with the development of the modern discipline of historical-critical study of the scriptures. This study arose in large measure out of the empiricism and historicity of the 18th-century Enlightenment period with its rejection of metaphysics and faith as giving access to truth that is beyond ordinary human sense experience. Because the churches for long regarded the atheistic tendencies of the philosophy of the Enlightenment as antagonistic to religion and worship they tended also to reject historical-critical study of the scriptures. The acceptance of the value of this study for greater discernment of the truth of the scriptures in many modern churches, both Reformation and Catholic, is a prime factor, I believe, in the present liturgical convergence.

Because Protestant scholars generally have been, until recently, in the vanguard of scriptural study, Catholics have regarded their work as one of the greatest contributions of the Reformation churches to liturgical reform. At the same time the Reformation churches have been able to see more clearly the value of the great liturgical heritage of the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches, particularly as those churches have been rediscovering through critical study their roots in the churches of the first few centuries. Inquiring behind the circumstances of the beginning of Christendom in the establishment of Christianity as the favored religion of the Roman Empire is being seen by many Christians today as uncovering an important source for renewal. The Reformation churches have been quick to appropriate such historical discoveries as the tradition of Hippolytus, among other early sources, for the structure and content of the eucharistic prayer. Early baptismal practices that were the sole rite of membership in the church, following an extensive catechumenate, and combining ample use of water, anointing with oil, and the laying on of hands with prayer for the Holy Spirit, are seen as essential in this era of recovery of the ministry of the whole people of God. Discoveries pertaining to the liturgy of time, including the calendar and lectionary and the liturgy of the hours or daily prayer, are being acknowledged also as critical to living in a secular realm by the rhythm of the gospel.

This appropriation of liturgical practices by the Reformation churches, in my opinion, has been made both possible and necessary because of a new appreciation of the nature and function of symbol and ritual. Modern study of language is revealing the dynamic nature of both words and symbols. Liturgy comprises both word-events and sign-acts. And both are means by which God can communicate and be present with human beings and human beings with God and one another. Liturgy that seeks to embrace the whole of reality, as revealed by a God who acts in incarnational ways, must be an embodied liturgy, appealing to all the senses of the body. Symbolic liturgy that includes sights as well as sounds, actions and gestures, the movements of procession and dance, and a renewed appreciation of the sacraments, opens up new possibilities for all to participate as they are able. For many Protestants, with their suspicion of ritual and symbol, the discovery by anthropologists that human beings are, by nature, ritual-making creatures has been an important one. It is through their rituals that human beings can come together in community around the apprehension of a deeper reality. Symbols and rituals are means by which reality is communicated and people are enabled to participate.

Many of the earlier debates between Protestants and Roman Catholics concerning the mode of God's presence in the sacraments are being superseded by a new language that speaks of God's presence in the symbolic action of the liturgy. The discovery of the biblical notion of the eschatological nature of the gospel has provided a new understanding of God's presence both within and beyond history. The words and symbols of the liturgy express both the "now" and the "not yet" of the reign of God that was proclaimed by Jesus and inaugurated in his ministry. Liturgy can be experienced as a foretaste of the future God has in store for the world. To participate in this anticipatory event is to commit oneself to working toward the justice, peace and love to which God is beckoning the whole world.

The renewal of liturgy in the Reformation churches finds its genuine motivation, in unity with other churches, in praise of a Creator who summons all earthly creatures to respond in faith, and in commitment to the renewal of a creation that is still "groaning in travail."

"For in this hope we were saved" (Rom 8:22).

Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, Faith and Order paper No. 111 (Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1982). Ferdinand Hahn, The Worship of the Early Church, trans. by David E. Green (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1973). David R. Newman, Worship As Praise and Empowerment (New York: Pilgrim Press, 1988). Hughes Oliphant Old, Worship That is Reformed According to Scripture (Atlanta: John Knox Press, 1984).

DAVID R. NEWMAN

REFORM, LITURGICAL, OF VATICAN II

Liturgical reform, sometimes euphemistically called restoration or renewal, can generally be distinguished from liturgical promotion, catechesis, and efforts for better participation. These latter do not necessarily involve altering or revising the received liturgical forms, elements, and words. Vatican II devoted a very small but important part of its constitution on the liturgy, Sacrosanctum concilium of December 4, 1963, to promotion and instruction (articles 14-20; 43-46—the articles of the constitution will simply be referred to below by number); the rest of the document deals with reform of the Roman liturgy. To say this is not to minimize the substantial doctrinal section on the nature of the liturgy at the beginning of chap. I (5-13) or the doctrinal paragraphs at the head of each of the six other chapters. But these doctrinal statements are to explain or support the reform, and the constitution is basically disciplinary, a reform decree. And the church as a human and earthly institution always stands in need of "perennial reformation" (U.R., 6).

Given the predominance of the Roman rite in the worldwide church, the direct concern in 1962-1963 was not with the other rites of the Latin church, much less with the rites of the Eastern churches, although the council invited a parallel revision of other rites where needed (4) or their organic development (O.E., 6), and even allowed for the possible creation of new rites in the future (4). Similarly, the non-liturgical or extra-liturgical life of the church was not ignored, but its reform is mentioned only once and then in strong terms: devotions "should be so fashioned that they harmonize with the liturgical seasons, accord with the sacred liturgy, are in some way derived from it, and lead the people to it, since, in fact, the liturgy by its very nature far surpasses any of them" (13).

The Context of Vatican II's Reform

The broader context of liturgical reform decreed by Vatican II and carried out in the years after the council is the modern liturgical movement. In the 19th century this was a matter of fresh scholarship, monastic and Gregorian chant revival, and the particular phenomenon of the suppression of the neo-Gallican rites in favor of the Roman liturgy. In the early 20th century these forces took a different turn in the direction of the broadest liturgical participation of the whole ecclesial community and a deeper theological appreciation of the social and spiritual implications of Christian public worship. For the most part, however, the movement or apostolate in Europe and elsewhere was directed toward better understanding and participation in the existing liturgical forms rather than in revision or reform.

The only substantive reform in the Roman liturgy since the 16th century was initiated but not completed by Pius X at the beginning of the 20th century. It involved a radical purging of the Roman liturgical calendar and other simplifications, affecting the eucharistic celebration and the daily offices, with the purpose of strengthening the primacy of the Lord's Day and the temporal cycle, especially the Lenten season. Concomitant with that pope's exhortations concerning Gregorian chant and the sense of liturgical participation as the source of Christian life was the even more important disciplinary revolution of early and frequent communion. None of this, however, touched upon the change of structures, rites, or even the prayer elements of the liturgy. Although the 16th-century Congregation of Rites had followed its mandate of revising the Roman liturgical books, the corrections in new editions were always minor. Even in 1930 when Pius XI added a historical section to the old congregation, its principal work by far was in the cases of beatification and canonization that involved historical research rather than the reform of the liturgical books, much less real revision of the rites themselves.

The 1947 encyclical of Pius XII on Christian worship, Mediator Dei et hominum, was welcomed as the first thorough exposition of contemporary doctrine on the liturgy and a strong support for popular participation. It contained no indication of plans—under consideration since 1946—to take up the reform of Pius X, but on May 28, 1948, the pope established a special commission for general liturgical reform. The work of this commission, slight only by comparison with the later conciliar reform, continued through the remaining years of Pius XII and even into the first years of John XXIII. It formed the immediate context of what would be undertaken by the council itself, and Pope John made the point explicitly in promulgating the new "code of rubrics" in 1962: "that the more basic principles (altiora principia) affecting the general liturgical restoration should be proposed" to the conciliar fathers for their determination.

The several accomplishments of the commission of Pius XII were significant enough in themselves, more significant as a forecast of what was becoming more evident: the encouragement of full participation by the whole people in the liturgy—and even the use of the vernacular, insinuated by Pius XII in the encyclical Mediator Dei and begun on a limited scale in the regional bilingual rituals of the sacraments in the 1950s—would be inadequate. In addition to the simplification of the calendar and rubrics and a private survey of the episcopate concerning the breviary (1956-1957), a few rites were actually revised by the commission: the Easter vigil (1951), the other services of Holy Week (1955), the pontifical rites for dedicating churches and for other occasions—but not ordinations (1961), and the baptism of adults (1962). In each case, however, the principles at work were the very ones which would later become commonplace: directions that "all" respond, listen to the readings, etc.; concentration on Christian initiation (both in the revised Easter vigil and in the baptismal rites for the stages of the catechumenate); suppression of duplications in which the priest had to recite the readings and chants properly belonging to others; occasional omission of the medieval accretions at the beginning and end of Mass; simpler and clearer structural elements in the revised section of the Roman Pontifical of 1961.

As in other historical instances of reform, the participation of particular individuals in the commission of Pius XII is significant, for example, that of Cardinal Agostino Bea, Redemptorist Josef Loew (who had initiated the project within the Congregation of Rites after the prefect and secretary had been directed by the pope to pursue the study of reform in 1946), and Vincentian Annibale Bugnini, the commission's secretary, who effectively guided the Roman reform from 1948 to 1975. From outside the Roman Curia came the influence of the post-World War II liturgical centers in Paris and Trier, both pastoral and scholarly in character, and the regular, informal gatherings of liturgical scholars—now concerned with reform as well as with promotion—during the 1950s.

The Role of Vatican II

In 1959 John XXIII invited proposals for the work of the general council he had announced. Among the responses received from the Catholic episcopate, universities and faculties and from the Roman Curia were very many concerning liturgical reform; they are included among the ante-preparatory acta of the council. These recommendations were subjected to study by the Preparatory Commission on the Liturgy, which worked from November 1960 to January 1962 to produce a draft of a disciplinary constitution for debate, amendment, and possible adoption by the conciliar fathers. Chaired by Cardinal Gaetano Cicognani, with Bugnini as secretary and principal organizer of the project, the bishops and priests of the commission made use of the worldwide proposals but also contributed a wealth of pastoral experience, scholarship, and above all their own positive commitment to liturgical reform.

The draft approved unanimously by the commission in early 1962 resembles the final document of the council closely enough. Before the opening of the council, however, the draft had first to be presented for review to the Central Preparatory Commission in the early spring of 1962. This was done by the liturgical commission's new president, Cardinal Arcadio Larraona, who had succeeded Cicognani upon the latter's death and who was clearly out of sympathy with the draft and with liturgical reform in general. In this he reflected judgments or attitudes within the Roman Curia which continued throughout the council and in the period after the council.

Although the review by the Central Preparatory Commission revealed substantial dissatisfaction with the draft, the number of emendations was relatively small. A few were serious, in particular a radical lessening of the proposed role of the national and other conferences of bishops in liturgical development—a role which was reduced to that of petitioning change rather than legislating it. A simple note was prefixed to the draft, attributing the program of potential liturgical reform exclusively to the existing Congregation of Rites. And explanatory “declarations” attached to the draft were suppressed, with the effect that the conciliar fathers later engaged in some needless debate because they lacked this information.

During the first weeks of Vatican II, in the fall of 1962, the draft of the constitution was debated exhaustively at fifteen meetings or general congregations, with as many negative arguments as positive. At the end, however, the text was almost unanimously accepted in principle, that is, as the basis of amendments to be prepared by the new Conciliar Commission on the Liturgy—a commission elected in larger part by the council but chaired by Larraona, with the Franciscan Ferdinando Antonelli, a major official of the Congregation of Rites, as secretary. Because it was the first document to be considered by the council, the procedural rules of amendments, extensive reports, review of specific objections or modi from those who were otherwise favorable, successive votes on sections and on the full text were scrupulously followed: the conciliar fathers voted 14 times in the two-year period before enacting the amended document by a vote of 2,147 to 4.

The opening chapter of the constitution—including the introductory doctrine and norms for liturgical promotion and education as well as the principles of reform—had been successfully completed and agreed upon in the first period of the council, leaving to the second period in 1963 the remaining chapters which deal with the more specific basics of reform. A detailed study of the variations, from draft to final decree, that is, the legislative history, has its own importance; these may be followed in the Acta Synodalia of Vatican II. The principal developments are especially revealing.

In chap. I, two restorations of the Preparatory Commission's original plan were achieved. All reference to the Congregation of Rites was suppressed; it was taken for granted (and explicitly mentioned in reports from the Conciliar Commission to the council) that a distinct reform commission would be created by the pope (see 25). More broadly, the implementation and enlargement of the reform—over and above the initial revision of the Roman rite as a whole—was attributed not only to the individual bishops of the local churches but also to their conferences or assemblies (22, 36, 39-40, 63, etc.).

During the amendment process, the heart of chap. I and indeed of the whole document, on the norms or principles of liturgical reform (21-40), was refined, strengthened, and given a more logical arrangement, with a guarantee of a limited but still open-ended concession of the vernacular. The most important reworking was perhaps that of the “norms for adapting the liturgy to the cultures and traditions of peoples” (37-40). As noted below, this section alone had and has the potential to recover the original style and polity of liturgical development arising out of the diverse customs and usages of worship within the Spirit-filled ecclesial community—a value far greater than the immediacies of Roman liturgical reform, successful as these have been as the fruit of Vatican II.

During the fall of 1963, revisions were approved in each of the succeeding chapters of the constitution, generally strengthening the force of the reform provisions in view of the initial and largely unexpected success of chap. I in 1962. Because the pastoral-liturgical scholarship on the eucharistic celebration was further advanced than in the other rites, chap. II on the eucharist could be sharply defined, clarifying especially the need for thorough reform of the Order of Mass (50); in the case of controverted matters like concelebration and communion from the cup, concessions were redrawn by way of examples without closing the door to any future expansion of the practices (55, 57).

In chap. III—on “the other sacraments and the sacramentals”—again the limited achievements in the preconconciliar reform of the liturgical catechumenate were solidified (65-71) along with the ritual reform of other sacraments and services, and the draft was amended substantially to allow the use of the vernacular without even the nominal limitations agreed upon in 1962 (63).

The amendment of chap. IV on the divine office was done carefully enough but without resolving the problem of the daily prayer of the whole Christian community as compared or contrasted to the traditions of an ecclesial prayer celebrated usually by the ordained and by religious. Without major questions, chap. V on the church year was improved in the light of debate, retaining among other things the purpose of subordinating the sanctoral observances to the celebration of the mysteries of the Lord, as had the reforming popes of the past (Pius V, Pius X, and John XXIII himself). In the treatment of liturgical music in chap. VI, a considerable abbreviation of the draft was achieved, partly in the hope of avoiding controversies over musical theory, while insisting upon popular participation in liturgical song and supporting the sung as well as the recited vernacular. A separate chapter of the draft on church appurtenances was suppressed in favor of a single article (128) within the final chapter of the document, concerned with liturgical art, architecture and furnishings.

By all counts the completed constitution, amended at the recommendation of a Conciliar Commission as sympathetic to reform as the Preparatory Commission had been, was stronger than the draft. As the first decree of Vatican II, it foreshadowed and influenced what was to come in the other 15 documents. The constitution begins with a summary of the conciliar purposes as a whole (renewal of Christian life, accommodation to contemporary life, ecumenism, and evangelization (1) and a seminal description of the church which celebrates the liturgy (2); this description would be taken up in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (see L.G. 1-17, esp. 8). The constitution's project for the ritual reform of Christian initiation (65-71) is respected in the other conciliar documents, e.g., whenever the interrelated sacraments of baptism, confirmation, and eucharist (and their sequence) are mentioned (see L.G., 11). Its project for the reform of the lectionaries and of homilizing is likewise reflected in treating the scriptures (D.v. 21, 24-25) and the ordained ministry (P.O., 4). Sometimes more obviously, sometimes in passing, the other documents incorporate a heightened sense of the place of a restored liturgy in the total life of the church community (see C.D., 30; P.O., 4-6; P.C. 6, 15; and O.T. 8, 16—although with much less concern for academic liturgical studies in presbyteral formation than decreed in 15-17). The importance of the liturgy in ecumenical relationships is heightened in the decree on that topic (see U.R. 15, 22).

In some instances the discipline of the liturgical constitution is directly augmented in other decrees, for example, in the restoration of the diaconate (L.G., 29). Canonically, the embryonic and indeterminate responsibilities attributed to conferences of bishops and their traditional antecedents, particular or regional councils (called "various kinds of competent territorial bodies of bishops lawfully established" in 22 § 1) are given a fixed procedure in the decree on the pastoral office of bishops in the church (C.D., 36-38). Here the principle of ecclesial subsidiarity, first explicitly applied to the church by Pius XII, is at work—as it affects both individual local churches and groups of local churches (compare also 22 § 1 and C.D., 8).

Another matter, in which the liturgical constitution could deal directly only with the ritual celebrations of Christian initiation, was taken up from a broader ecclesial viewpoint in the Decree on the Missionary Activity of the Church (A.G., 13-14; see also L.G., 14). In this case the total process of catechumenal formation is described in terms integrating it with (and sanctifying it by) the liturgical celebrations.

Conciliar Norms for Liturgical Reform

Despite the experience, scholarship, and basic agreement among the original authors and the conciliar revisers of the document, the statement of reform principles (given in 21-40) had inevitably to be abstract and general. This was all the likelier because a consensus had to be reached among at least two-thirds of the conciliar fathers. This makes the strong articulation of general principles, designed to govern the disciplinary reform after the council had acted, still more remarkable.

The formal norms or principles are enumerated under four headings after a rather euphemistic reference to the need for reform, namely, to change elements "if they have suffered from the intrusion of anything out of harmony with the inner nature of liturgy or have become pointless" (21) and the altogether fundamental (and explanatory) statement of purpose: "In this reform both text and rites should be so drawn up that they express more clearly the holy things that they signify and so that the Christian people, as far as possible, are able to understand them with ease and to take part in the rites fully, actively, and as befits a community" (21). This language explains in part what is sometimes called the rather cerebral or intellectual nature of the reform. In fact it aims at intelligibility as an essential prerequisite to participation that is total—of the whole person, mind and body, will and intellect, interior and exterior, rather than accidental or partial; active rather than passive; and communal rather than individualistic. None of this goal need be, nor was intended to be, at the expense of inner piety, the aesthetic dimension of the liturgy, or the full psychological and indeed emotional commitment of each member of the assembly—quite the opposite.

(1) General Norms (22-25). Under this heading, the locus of power and liturgical authority is first determined in the bishop of Rome, the chief bishop, and in each of the diocesan bishops at the head of the respective local churches and, at the intermediary level, in assemblies of bishops from a group of churches (22). The determination is made by the council itself, by the supreme authority of the college of bishops—and then the means to reform the Roman liturgy as a whole is mandated: by revising the traditional liturgical books "as soon as possible" (25). The first decree, on the holders of authority, governs whether there is reform or not; the second, on revision, is directed toward the immediate future, but may be taken also as a reminder that the reform at the universal level, or at least throughout the Latin church, is something that must not be done and then neglected for three or four centuries as had happened once the post-Tridentine revisions were complete.

Two central matters are touched on as "general," and both are critical. The first is that reform should be an organic development, preceded by exhaustive study and introduced only if "the good of the Church genuinely and certainly requires . . ." (23). Here a balance is proposed between sound tradition (always in contrast to the weaknesses and defects long evident in the "traditional" Roman liturgy) and legitimate progress. It has particular application also to the fourth set of norms, on liturgical adaptation. On the one hand, the most radical development is not ruled out, even to the extent of a new and entirely non-Roman or non-Latin rite in different cultures (see 4, 40); on the other hand, the hope and expectation are clear: it should be possible to reform the Roman rite and, still within its substantial unity (38), adapt and accommodate it. The balance between innovation and precedent—if the precedent or tradition is itself sound—corresponds to the constitution's initial statement of the total conciliar purpose, in particular, the strengthening of the Christian life and accommodation of any and all changeable institutions to the needs of the times (1).

The second central question treated among these general norms is the grave deficiency of the preconciliar Roman liturgy in the use of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. The weakness is not mentioned but only understood in the positive exposition of the place of scripture in the liturgy: readings, psalms, prayers, songs, the source of religious meaning for actions and signs. At this point the terms of the reform of the use of scripture are not stated, only that the promotion of the role of the written word of God as proclaimed in the assembly is "essential to achieve the reform, progress, and adaptation of the liturgy" (24).

Unspoken but underlying this statement—and the more specific norms that appear in the third section of the rules for reform—is the fact that in the 16th century other Christian churches of the West restored the place of the word of God in the assembly of worship, sometimes disproportionately at the expense of the eucharistic sacrament, sometimes in the balanced style now planned by Vatican II. It is a good example also of something preserved outwardly in the Roman liturgy (that is, an actual liturgy of the word within every eucharistic celebration) but clearly subordinate as well as unintelligible because of the Latin language employed, with the homily in practice an interruption when indeed it was included.

(2) Hierarchic and Communal Nature of the Liturgy (26-32). Despite its title, the principles set down in this section are almost entirely concerned with non-hierarchic participation in the celebration—since this had to be the basic reform: to return to the whole Christian assembly its full share in the services of worship and to accord individual members of the community, including lay as well as ordained, their special and appropriate roles. This dimension of reform is a kind of clericalization of the Roman liturgy. By no means does it deny or minimize the hierarchic role of bishops and presbyters as the presidents of the liturgical assembly or of deacons assisting and guiding the assembly. Rather it corrects the medieval assumption of all the parts—prayers, readings, and song—by the presiding celebrant, especially in the commonest liturgical rite, the non-sung eucharist.

Two of the norms, on the public and communal nature of all liturgical services and on communal participation, are very broadly stated. The first puts into more concrete terms the constitution's own definition of the Christian liturgy (7); it insists on the differentiation of liturgical roles "of the individual members of the Church in different ways, according to their different [sacramental] orders, offices, and actual participation" (26). The principle is made normative for the reform—and for the future—by stating once for all that "each one, [ordained] minister or layperson, who has an office to perform, should do all of, but only, those parts which pertain to that office by the nature of the rite and the principles of liturgy" (28).

The other rule gives preference to communal celebration over "a celebration that is individual and, so to speak, private" (27). An application is made in the first place to the eucharist, but with a proviso that "every Mass has of itself a public and social character." This is one of the more cautious or hesitant elements of the document: the Missa privata of priest and server, though not necessarily the solitary Mass, must not appear to be condemned out of hand. The same point might have been made of auricular confession, where the minister and penitent constitute the ecclesial community at worship and where again the council, for all its preference for truly communal celebration, could hardly condemn the medieval and modern tradition.

Direct guidance for the Roman reform is offered in another paragraph, one that enumerates the parts to be assigned to the people in the revised liturgical books: "acclamations, responses, psalmody, antiphons, and songs, as well as by actions, gestures, and bearing" (30). To this was added an element overlooked in the original draft: "And at the proper times all should observe a reverent silence." The reference to "all" means the assembly as a whole and also the presiding celebrant, the ministers, singers, and others. This directive proposed to correct a severe defect in the old Roman rite: there were no formally prescribed periods of liturgical silence, and what silence there was existed because people were silent when they should have been speaking or singing, because the priest said the central eucharistic prayer quietly, or because there were practical gaps in the service. The reform, proposed in a brief clause, was to introduce religious and communal silence at certain points.

(3) Teaching and Pastoral Character of the Liturgy (33-36). At least one-third of the 131 articles of the constitution are concerned with communal celebration in terms of the active participation of the congregation, externalized in word or act or gesture, or in common silence as just mentioned. The preconciliar rite did not formally prohibit such participation, but the restrictions on the recited or dialogue Mass did not disappear until 1958. Even the Roman instruction of that year did not stimulate anything like universal acceptance, and the form of the rites themselves, whether of the eucharist or of other sacraments and services, inhibited such participation.

The concern for comprehensible rites, in which the doctrine of the liturgy as the act of the Christian community might become evident, stands at the head of the entire treatment of reform mentioned already (21), and the explicit concern for simplicity is found in this third section. A balance is struck between the cultic dimension of the liturgy, the community's union with Christ in the worship of God (and God's action in the liturgy, as defined in 7) and what is described as the teaching, formative, and didactic element.

The constitution does not show great anxiety on this point, but it cannot be read properly to permit the liturgy to become a catechetical lesson or a largely didactic, indoctrinating exercise. Instead the theory is enunciated that, even prescind from the intangible working of divine power, all the liturgical elements as compiled or created—and now to be reformed—have an instructive side and effect. This is obvious in the case of the explicit proclamation of the word in readings and preaching, but also in prayers, songs, action, whether these are done by the assembly as a whole or assimilated by it and affirmed by it. The doing is the more important, whether it is the celebration of the word or the singing of a psalm or the assent of an "Amen," but the learning by that doing is demanded in the reform. The liturgy is thus declared to have a teaching and a pastoral nature, and it is the purpose of third set of norms to guide the reform in this direction.

If the mention of the didactic side includes a certain peril—that the rites might become classroom lectures—the same is true of the specific directive that "the rites should be marked by a noble simplicity; they should be short, clear, and unencumbered by useless repetitions; they should be within the people's powers of comprehension and as a rule not require much explanation" (34).

The background of this norm of the decree involves the historical development of the Roman liturgy, which is understood to have been characterized in the beginning by great austerity and simplicity, for example, in the ancient presidential prayers. In some measure Vatican II intended to canonize this simplicity in view of the complex excesses of medieval or earlier eclecticism in the rite, while allowing (in the fourth set of norms) room for adaptability and augmentation. Instances of complexity (and incomprehensibility) had been canonized after the Council of Trent, despite the pruning of the calendar: excessive verbalization, repetitiousness of gestures, court ceremonial carried to an extreme, minutiae of rubrical directions, preservation of the obsolete—all remained as characteristic of the modern preconconciliar rite.

The danger in reform was recognized in the qualification that the desired and required simplicity be noble. This is stated to counter the possibility that the simplification might itself be extreme, inelegant, or unaesthetic, although none of such defects is a necessary mark of simplicity in human creations. The weight, moreover, is placed upon clarity, brevity, avoidance of clumsy and meaningless (and wearying) repetition, and a degree of comprehensibility that needs little explanation to the assembly. While recognizing the dangers of what has been called over-verbalization, the constitution had to leave unresolved the general level of understanding at which the rites should be comprehensible. Elsewhere it is clear that the ordinary Sunday assembly is meant (see 42, 49) and certainly not a gathering of a sophisticated and highly cultivated elite. The use of the loosely definable term "pastoral" at the head of the section is thus explained and justified.

Noble simplicity, brevity, and clarity apply equally to rites and to words. In the case of words, however, the reform of the Roman rite in the Latin language, although necessary and here decreed by Vatican II, could not achieve these purposes without transferring these goals to the genius of the respective vernacular language. Before touching this matter of the vernacular, however, the section on teaching and pastoral nature of the liturgy deals directly with the relation of words and rites, stating broadly but significantly that more of scripture should be read in the worshipping assembly, with selections or pericopes more varied and apposite (34, 1); that preaching is integral to the liturgical celebration and should have a content consistent with its context in the celebration—as the proclamation of God's wonderful works (35, 2; see 52, 92); and that the needed liturgical catechesis may be supplemented even during the liturgy by brief and discreet explanations (35, 3).

A final norm (35, 4), not in the draft, was added to encourage (non-eucharistic) celebrations of the word of God in general and also in place of the eucharist when no ordained priest is present to preside. Underlying this is dissatisfaction with the style of existing popular non-sacramental services (see 13), a recognition that the canonical office of daily hours is inadequate for the purpose, and awareness of the paucity of ordained ministers in some regions, to grow graver in succeeding years.

As a matter of reform, the cautious concession of the vernacular is of vast impact but rather simple in terms of the Roman revision, since the matter of determining the extent of such use was simply left to the discretion of the conferences of bishops, subject to Roman review, and the translation into the vernaculars might be of either a revised or an unrevised Roman rite. The constitution at this point treats the matter as one of discipline (36) and subsequently as a lesser kind of regional adaptation (39) almost distinct from the formal liturgical reform of the Roman rite being decreed.

(4) Adaptation to Cultures and Traditions (37-40). Just as the doctrinal and promotional parts of chap. I of the constitution might have been decreed without reform taking place, so the first three sections concerned with reform could have been agreed upon and carried out with a radically changed but still rigidly uniform Roman liturgy celebrated by most of the hundreds of millions of Christians in full communion with the See of Rome—but in the respective vernaculars. This makes the final section on reform all the more significant, if necessarily embryonic.

These paragraphs recognize that a reform of the Roman liturgy, however thorough and sound in its implementation, will be inadequate for the diversity of cultures and traditions in the local churches. This is evident in the case of cultures far removed from the relatively common and shared European culture, such as those in the younger churches of missionary lands now known as the Third World, but the text of the constitution is carefully crafted to extend the potential adaptability or diversity to regions no longer considered missionary, perhaps especially those where there are major differences among cultures and subcultures.

Since this development was almost unknown terrain in 1963 and the conciliar fathers could deal directly only with the perceived needs of reforming the basic, nuclear, and exemplary Roman rite, the principles are broadly stated and the norms are canonical.

The principle of adaptation—using the term in its broadest sense of any development arising out of the Roman liturgical reform already mandated—is stated both negatively and positively: to avoid “rigid uniformity in matters that do not affect the faith or the good of the whole community”; to “preserve intact” and even “admit such elements [of indigenous cultures and traditions] into the liturgy itself, provided they are in keeping with the true and authentic spirit of the liturgy” (37). No elaboration into questions of acculturation or inculturation was made, nor was it then possible. The openness to incremental (or abbreviating) variants of the rite, once revised, was established in principle, and it remained only to set up a pattern for regional reform.

In turn this was done by distinguishing between, first, the variants or adaptations which would be judged ordinary and usual and, second, those of a more profound or radical kind. For the first, the “substantial unity of the Roman rite” was to be respected (38), the conferences of bishops would be competent to make the decisions, and the Roman revision itself should anticipate these adaptations and enumerate them in the rubrics of the Roman liturgical books “especially in the case of the sacraments, the sacramentals, processions, liturgical language, sacred music, and the arts" (39). By saying that the revised Roman liturgical books should make provision for anticipated variants, thus determining a priori the more evident or likely ways in which conferences of bishops would feel it desirable to act, a category of lesser adaptations was defined and the potential development made a part of the basic Roman reform. What was not done, and could not have been done a priori, was to give an adequate rationale for distinguishing such adaptations from the more profound developments also envisioned; in fact this is a matter of degree and almost an invitation to subjectivity, ordinarily by judging small variants major.

For the second category of truly major and profound adaptations, more than the usual Roman review of national or regional liturgical books was demanded by the conciliar constitution: after study the conferences may "propose" such radical changes—even outside the (undefined) "substantial unity of the Roman rite"—to the Roman See, the consent of which is required for the actual introduction of radical adaptations. In this connection the conciliar decree raises the expectation that the Roman See will empower the conferences "to permit and direct, as the case requires, the necessary preliminary experiments within certain groups suited for the purpose and for a fixed time" (40). Not every case need require trial use, but the Roman See undertook to permit experiment even prior to giving its definitive assent to the serious adaptations of this nature.

In this fashion a total plan of reform was designed: the revision of the Roman liturgy, together with its use in the vernacular; the incorporation of potential adaptations into the revised rites, with their adoption left to the judgment of the respective assemblies of bishops; and more radical changes introduced, possibly after trial use, but only with Roman prior assent. Thus, too, the liturgical reform of Vatican II was not only defined and decreed with norms, guidelines, and principles, but its potential further reform on a regional basis was vastly enlarged in a few brief sentences.

It is arguable that the norms for revision decreed in this fashion had omissions, and certainly they could not foresee all the needed liturgical reforms—not even in the details which filled chaps. II-VII of the document. In a sense they are inward-looking, oriented toward the church community in itself and almost exclusively when the church is at worship (see 41). The references to the relationship of the liturgy to the whole of Christian life are few (see 1, 9-12); the references to the liturgy as a function of the church's relation to "those outside" (see 1-2) are relatively slight. Much of this was simply left to the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (L.G.)—undergoing thorough reworking while the liturgical document was being put in final form—and the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (G.S.), plans for which were being discussed just as chap. I of the document was being completed in 1962.

There is no explicit mention, moreover, of the phenomenological or anthropological dimensions of the "theological, historical, and pastoral [including empirical] investigation" that should, along with contemporary experience, precede the project or projects of reform (23), whether of the Roman rite or of its adaptation (see 40). All this is left under the broad heading of "cultural." Nonetheless a substantive charter was drawn up, far beyond anything done by any council or pope before, for pastoral and practical implementation.

The Process of Reform

When it was certain that the constitution on the liturgy would be ready for final vote at the end of the second period of Vatican II, Paul VI began preparations for its implementation. He directed one of the papal delegates or moderators of the council, Cardinal Giacomo Lercaro, Archbishop of Bologna and also an elected member of the Conciliar Commission on the Liturgy, to assemble a few periti in order to prepare an executory or implementing document. Lercaro chaired the group of nine, with Annibale Bugnini as secretary, and the first meeting was held on October 12, 1963. Although the instruction on implementation itself was not to appear until ten months after the promulgation of the constitution, the planning was underway and only a few weeks after the promulgation, in January 1964, Paul VI established a formal post-conciliar commission, called the Consilium for the Implementation of the Constitution on the Liturgy. This was in full harmony with the thinking of the council's own commission, which had repeatedly left matters to a future commission, yet to be named, distinct from the existing Congregation of Rites.

Although the details of the procedure and the persons involved are less important than the results of the massive project—the reform of all the liturgical books of the Roman rite—the body was somewhat out of the tradition of the curial congregations. Its membership ultimately included almost sixty bishops, only a small fraction of whom were cardinals. There were about 150 consultants in all and an additional 75 counselors, the latter being consulted on occasion and on particular points. Half a dozen observers from other churches also participated in the work, and were regularly present during the Consilium's plenary meetings, of which there were 13 from 1964 to 1970.

The consultants directly engaged in the work were formed into study bodies called coetus studiorum corresponding to the liturgical books to be revised, with various subgroups. Over the period from 1964 to 1969, when the Consilium was in effect succeeded by the new Congregation for Divine Worship, again with Bugnini as secretary, the groups or committees developed an immense volume of schemata of documents, texts, and sections of liturgical books. These in turn were repeatedly revised and then reviewed by a small central group of consultants for submission to the Consilium members themselves and, upon approval, to Paul VI. Other avenues of consultation were undertaken, especially within the Roman Curia, either by the Consilium or by the pope himself, until final promulgation of the several parts of the revised Roman books.

Although the initial creation of the Consilium was not in terms of an adjunct body of the Congregation of Rites, in mid-1964 the other body acquired the right to review the definitive work of the Consilium. Beginning with the first instruction of implementation issued in September 1964 and continuing through the publication of the Roman missal in 1969, the decrees of publication were regularly issued in the congregation's name and signed by its prefect and secretary as well as by the Consilium's president. This was at best an uncomfortable procedure, since the congregation did not have staff or consultants competent in the field of liturgical revision; the relationship continued through the curial reform of 1967, in which the Consilium was acknowledged to retain its responsibility, its experts considered experts of the congregation, but its decisions subject to review by the congregation's section on worship. In 1969 distinct Congregations, for Divine Worship and for the Causes of Saints, replaced the old congregation and the anomalous situation ceased.

The Congregation for Divine Worship succeeded the Consilium, but its constituent membership was principally cardinals and its body of consultants reduced to a minimum. Nonetheless it continued the Consilium's work in much the same style until it was combined, in 1975, with the Congregation for the [Discipline of the] Sacraments, and Bugnini, who had provided almost uninterrupted continuity in Roman liturgical reform since 1948, was transferred to the papal diplomatic service. By that time all the major work of immediate implementation had been completed; later documents and books depended largely on the study during the decade after the council. The potential for regional adaptation, well underway in some countries by 1975, remained in doubt thereafter.

The task facing the Consilium from the beginning was complicated by the need to distinguish between the reforms which could be put into effect almost immediately (including the introduction of the vernacular, although this was the primary responsibility of the conferences of bishops) while using the existing liturgical books or slight supplements to them and those reforms which would require several years of study, experiment, and preparation. A policy of gradualism was adopted, and until 1968 a series of instructions and minor liturgical publications was employed to introduce the changes mandated by Vatican II. Then, with the issuance of the rites for the celebration of the sacrament of holy orders, the series of reformed liturgical books (q.v.) began to appear, generally as soon as the work was completed to the satisfaction of the Consilium itself, the interested bodies of the Roman Curia, and Paul VI, who diligently examined each document or volume to be issued.

During this period, the revised rites were subjected to experiment—not the experiment mentioned in the liturgical constitution as the responsibility of conferences of bishops when needed to make major adaptations (40), but for the direct purpose of reforming the Roman rite as a whole. The most important experiments were with the Order of Mass, first with smaller groups and then with the whole Consilium, later with the Synod of Bishops (1967), and finally with the participation of Paul VI on several occasions. Concelebration (which, together with the rite for communion under both kinds, went into effect universally in early 1965), the funeral rites, Christian initiation (both the rites related to the catechumenate and the order for the baptism of children), and other rites were tried out in many places throughout the world, generally in restricted circumstances or limited groups.

The total, if initial and basic, reform of the Roman liturgy can be seen only in the fully developed liturgical books, but the series of intervening steps in the process, both the study and the published documents, are revealing, since no such legislative history has ever been available in cases of earlier liturgical reform. The published instructions of the Roman See constitute only part of this record but, next to the definitive liturgical books themselves, are the most important.

The initial instruction of implementation (September 1964) introduced simplifications into the Order of Mass and, to a lesser degree, the other sacramental celebrations. A second and similar instruction appeared in 1967, again following the plan of gradual introduction of reforms, especially in the eucharist, and still limited by the need to complete the fully revised books. A third instruction of implementation, issued in 1970, had a different character, enjoining observance of liturgical discipline and appearing to inhibit regional adaptations, especially adaptations of the Roman missal, which had just been completed.

Other reform instructions included one on music in 1967, which attempted, among other things, to reconcile the chant and the sung liturgy in general with use of the vernacular. A second instruction of the same year dealt with questions of eucharistic cult, especially outside Mass—an issue carefully avoided in the conciliar treatment of the reform; the instruction attempted to strengthen the relationship between the eucharistic celebration and secondary devotions, while demonstrating, for example, how and why the eucharist should be reserved and worshipped in a chapel or area distinct from the church sanctuary. Another influential instruction prepared by the Consilium treated liturgical translation (1969), both freeing it from any kind of slavish literalism and acknowledging, in its final paragraph, the greater need for the new composition of liturgical prayers in accord with the genius of each language.

Reform "by Decree of Vatican II"

The Roman books for liturgical celebration, especially from 1968 onward, may be studied directly for their fidelity to the conciliar norms. They never exceed the mandate given by Vatican II and reveal all the pastoral, liturgical, and doctrinal study that went into their careful preparation. The rites as a whole are marked by the noble simplicity but also by a degree of flexibility—especially the inclusion of options and alternatives—and a richness of texts that was hardly anticipated before the work got under way in 1964. On the other hand, although done promptly enough (25), as each year passed the pressures grew to publish quickly and to accept compromises that seemed to weaken the conciliar resolve. These may be attributed to forces within and outside the Roman Curia, still greatly disaffected by conciliar reform, and the desire of Paul VI and indeed of the Consilium itself to achieve greater consensus.

The best means to follow the history of the development of the liturgical reform, in addition to the unpublished documents of the Consilium and later of the Congregation for Divine Worship that are preserved in archives, is the collection, in English translation, Documents on the Liturgy 1963-1979: Conciliar, Papal, and Curial Documents, prepared by the International Commission on English in the Liturgy; the basic documents in the original texts are collected in Reiner Kaczynski's Enchiridion Documentorum Instaurationis Liturgicae covering the period 1963-1983. Bugnini's La riforma liturgica (1948-1975) gives an exhaustive and accurate account of the work. Only the briefest mention of the principal rites can be given here.

For the eucharistic celebration, the critical task was the restoration of the Order of Mass itself, designed to be an exemplar for both simpler and more solemn eucharistic celebrations (1969). Despite the objections raised to it—one curial group considered it heretical—it is a traditional rite, one in which the more radical plan anticipated by the conciliar fathers has become somewhat more complex. Of equal weight were the critical improvement and generous enlargement of the corpus of euchological texts—from the simple presidential prayers to the anaphoras with their prefaces (1970); the new calendar, applicable to the daily liturgy of the hours as well as the eucharist (1969); and the vastly enlarged order of biblical readings, both in the three-year Sunday cycle based largely on the semi-continuous reading of the synoptic gospels and in the weekday lectionary (1969).

The lectionary deserves special mention in itself. While the quality of proclamatory preaching within the eucharist could not be reformed by simple decree, the passages of the written word of God could be appointed for announcement in the assembly more generously and with clearer design. It also deserves mention because of its impact and acceptance, more direct than any other element of the Roman reform, in many other churches in the English-speaking world which now follow the Roman pattern of Sunday readings. The calendar, on the other hand, achieved the chief purposes of chap. V of the constitution but only with a major compromise. Instead of leaving those saints' days which lack universal cult or significance to regional or local calendars, two new principles were introduced which overburdened the sanctoral: a large number of lesser saints' days remained in the Roman calendar as options but with almost as much prominence as ever, to the detriment of the temporal cycle of the church year, and—with similar effect—observances were added to reflect universality, by including representative feasts of saints from each region or continent.

In the rites of the other sacraments, a better celebration of the word of God was uniformly introduced, even in cases in which the sacrament is not celebrated within a eucharistic liturgy. The primary concern was Christian initiation, to which the constitution had directed major attention. The work of the Consilium was complicated by the need to produce a rite of baptism of children promptly (1969)—for pastoral reasons and because the existing rite was so unsuitable for infants and young children—so that the integral nature of sacramental initiation through baptism, confirmation, and eucharist was not immediately apparent. Similarly, the pastoral reality of postponing confirmation in many parts of the Latin church and even inverting the sequence of confirmation and eucharist required a separate book for confirmation (1971). Nevertheless the total rite, the order of Christian initiation of adults corresponding to the catechumenate of those who are no longer infants, respected the tradition of both East and West—the older tradition of the West—and the liturgical and theological doctrine embraced by Vatican II (1971).

The rite of marriage was completed early on (1969), enhanced by texts from non-Roman usage and new wedding blessings—and with greater allowance than in other cases for regional differences, a diversity which had been protected even by the Council of Trent. The order for the care and for the sacrament of anointing of the sick, with its primary purposes recovered (see 73-75) and the language of its form (like that of confirmation) revised, was published along with the rite for the eucharist as viaticum for the distinct case of the dying—all enriched with readings and prayers (1972).

The sacrament of penance was issued only after some delay (1973)—partly because the plan to employ a deprecatory form or forms as alternative expressions of sacramental absolution was defeated and partly because the rites of communal celebration, whether with or without individual auricular confession of sins, had first to be restricted by more rigid canonical controls than the revisers sought. In particular, the second or communal rite of reconciliation with individual confession of sins, expected by Paul VI to become frequent or usual, demanded individual absolution instead of a more traditional absolution by the presiding minister; the third rite prepared by the Consilium, fully developed for sacramental reconciliation without individual confession, was more and more hemmed in by canonical norms. But the new rites were richer in their prayer texts, open to wide accommodation by the minister of the sacrament, and supplemented by suggested patterns for non-sacramental penitential services.

In the case of the sacrament of orders, the revision (1968) achieved a major shortening and simplification for the ordination of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, including the substitution of an ancient form for the ordination of bishops. The completion of the rites associated with other ministries had to await the decision, already clear enough from the sense of Vatican II (L.G., Chap., III), to suppress tonsure and minor orders; even here the carefully constructed rites of institution of lay ministers (1971) were frustrated in practice by the canonical rule that they be employed also for those who would later seek to be admitted to the sacramental orders—and by the restriction of liturgical institution to men.

The other major services, whether called sacramentals, lesser sacraments, or blessings and dedications, were prepared with careful study by the Consilium, one of the most successful being the order of funerals (1969)—although it demanded and allowed considerable regional or cultural adaptation. As in the case of ordinations, the Gallican rites for the dedication of churches and the like were radically reformed and reduced in length (1977). Only the collection of diverse blessings was greatly delayed, largely because of an initial policy to keep to a minimum of such rites—they had increased notably in the modern Roman Ritual—and to leave the rest to the conferences of bishops according to national or regional need. The policy changed, and it was only a decade after the final sacramental rite (penance) was issued that a large and diffuse book of blessings appeared (1984). It respected, however, the conciliar decree to give a greater place to the reading of the scriptures (35, 1) and to permit qualified lay persons to celebrate certain of the blessings (79).

Parallel to the reform of the Roman eucharistic and other sacramental liturgies was the complex matter of a new office of daily ecclesial prayer, renamed the liturgy of the hours (1971). The result was a compromise: on the one hand, a greatly enriched and improved collection of prayers and readings, new intercessory prayers, and structures better suited to either communal or individual praying; on the other hand, so much attention to the so-called monastic office and to the individual praying of the office by ordained ministers that the chief hours of morning and evening prayer could not be said to satisfy, as the Order of Mass had satisfied, the pastoral situation in parochial life. Plans to add to the structure a restored form of psalm prayers were not followed (although they appear in English versions of the liturgy of the hours), nor were alternative volumes of biblical, patristic, and other readings published.

Inevitably, judgments will differ about the quality of the reform, done by the Roman See "by decree of the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council and promulgated by authority of Pope Paul VI" and, in a couple of later instances, by Pope John Paul II. Looked at as a whole and most certainly in comparison with any earlier reworkings or refurbishing of the Roman liturgy, the work was an extraordinary success. It was achieved under pastoral pressure from the Catholic episcopate in their conferences and by the Catholic people of the Latin church at large; it was done also in the realization that minimizing and anti-conciliar forces, though a minority during the celebration of Vatican II, were so influential as to require a rapid if gradual reform lest greater compromises or retrenchment be demanded. If the liturgical books are looked upon as collections of texts, as euchologies or lectionaries, they are in every way superior to earlier books, certainly to those of the post-Tridentine period; if they are looked at as revisions of ritual structures and elements, they fall short in some ways—some remain less clear and simple than Vatican II had decreed—but again they come vastly closer to the perceived needs of the worshipping assemblies of the church.

Two unresolved questions remain. The first, less important, is the continuing evolution of the basic Roman rite through further revision—lest the experience of the centuries from 1568 (the Roman breviary of Pius V) to the 1960s and 1970s be lost and another rigidity and uniformity become the norm or a false ideal. The second, both more challenging and more promising, is the recapture of the openness of Vatican II to liturgical adaptation, that is, to move beyond the achieved reforms to the cultural suitability of the rites—further altered, supplemented creatively but in accord with the best traditions, and even carefully pruned—to the particular churches of individual nations and areas.

Thus the immediate liturgical reform of Vatican II has been achieved at the quasi-universal level and in the printed texts of service books, first in Latin and then in the various vernaculars. The degree of its success in the living communities of faith that follow the Roman rite can be known only through the most elaborate accumulation of empirical evidence—and then largely in terms of external celebration. What is clear and certain is that the excellence of what was done in compliance with the conciliar decision should not be an obstacle to the cultural and other adaptability then envisioned.

See Liturgical movement, the (1830-1969); Liturgical books; Documents, Roman liturgical, since Vatican II

W. Baraúna, ed. The Liturgy of Vatican II, 2 vols. (Chicago, 1966). C.J. Barry, Worship and Work (Collegeville, MN, 1956). C. Braga, et al., eds., Liturgia opera divina e umana. Studi sulla riforma liturgica offerti a S.E. Mons. Annibale Bugnini (Rome, 1982). A. Bugnini, La riforma liturgica (1948-1975) (Rome, 1983). C. Braga and A. Bugnini, eds. The Commentary on the Constitution and on the Instruction on the Sacred Liturgy (New York, 1964). A.J. Chupungco, Cultural Adaptation of the Liturgy (New York, 1982). M. Collins, Worship and Renewal (Washington, 1987). Congregazione per il Culto Divino, Atti del Convegno dei Presidenti e Segretari delle Commissioni Nazionali di Liturgia 23-28 Ottobre 1984 (Padua, 1986). J.D. Crichton, The Church's Worship (New York, 1964). International Commission on English in the Liturgy, ed. Documents on the Liturgy 1963-1979: Conciliar, Papal, and Curial Texts (Collegeville, MN, 1982). J.A. Jungmann, "Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy," In Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II, ed. H. Vorgrimler, I: 1-88 (New York, 1967). R. Kaczynski, ed., Enchiridion Documentorum Instaurationis Liturgicae, I (1963-1973), Turin, 1976; II (1973-1983). Rome, 1988. B. Koenker, The Liturgical Renaissance in the Roman Catholic Church (Chicago, 1954). C. Lasz, ed., Remembering the Future: Vatican II and Tomorrow's Liturgical Agenda (New York, 1983). B.J. Lee, ed., Alternative Futures for Worship, 7 vols. (Collegeville, MN, 1987). A.G. Martimort, ed., The Church at Prayer, 4 vols. (Collegeville, MN, 1986-1988). F.R. McManus, "Liturgical Reform," In New Catholic Encyclopedia, 8: 908-910. F.R. McManus, Sacramental Worship (New York, 1967). A. Nocent, The Future of the Liturgy (New York, 1963). O. Rousseau, Progress of the Liturgy (Westminster, MD, 1951). H. Schmidt, La costituzione sulla sacra Liturgia (Rome, 1966).

FREDERICK R. McMANUS

REFORMATION CHURCHES

See Traditions, liturgical, in the West: post-Reformation; Sacraments in the Reformation churches; Reform, liturgical, in Reformation churches

REFORMATION OF LIFE

As a result of forgiveness of sins one is expected to change one's life. Metanoia is the technical word for "change of heart" which embraces sorrow for sin and the intention of leading a new life. One expresses this by confession made to the church, by making due satisfaction for the sins committed and by amending one's life (Rite of Penance, 6).

When one sins, one turns away from God as the younger son turned from the father to dissipate his inheritance (Lk 11:13). Forgiveness entails turning back to God with a change of heart as the prodigal son made up his mind to return home and ask forgiveness of his father (Lk 11:18). By accepting and performing the penance or satisfaction for sins committed; by changing the conduct of one's life; by repairing the injury and damages caused by one's former ways, the sinner demonstrates true conversion. Life can no longer be conducted as it was in the past, metanoia must be lived out in daily existence.

True conversion is completed by acts of penance, satisfaction for the sins committed, amendment of conduct and also by the reparation of injury (R.P. 6C). Satisfaction is meant to be a remedy for the sin committed and can take the form of good works, fasting, service or prayers. Thus the sinner is required to do something that will directly remedy the evil of the sinful act which will give a powerful reminder of past sin and the loving forgiveness of God. Amendment of conduct means to change habits, actions, style of life; it means avoiding persons and places connected with sin. Reparation of injury means restitution which is necessarily connected with reformation of life. One cannot restore the disorder of sin without giving back what was taken, be this reputation, goods, property, etc. The confessor has the obligation to advise the penitent on proper restitution.

See Contrition; Conversion from sin; Satisfaction

James Dallen, The Reconciling Community, The Rite of Penance (New York: Pueblo Publishing Company, Inc., 1986).

JOSEPH L. CUNNINGHAM

RESERVATION OF THE EUCHARIST

See Eucharist, reservation of the; Eucharistic chapel

REVERENCE

Reverence (Lat. RE + vereri, to feel awe of, fear) is both a noun and a verb indicating a relational stance of deep respect before a person, or by extension, any reality that is held to be sacred or worthy of honor. In matters liturgical, we treat here (a) reverence to God, (b) reverence to the people assembled, and (c) reverence for the liturgical materials: rites, prayers, symbolic acts and holy objects.

(a) Reverence to God. In both the OT and NT God is acknowledged to be the Holy One (e.g., Isa 43:3; Rev 16:5), worthy of love, honor and praise, before whom heaven and earth bow low in humble adoration. In almost all eucharistic anaphoras God is proclaimed "thrice holy" for filling the heavens and the earth with God's own glory. In all liturgical action, the ecclesia, the gathered assembly, takes its stance before the mystery of God, to listen to God's word, to raise their voices to God in prayer, and to welcome God's own gracious approach and even more gracious action into their lives. Liturgy is the "work of the people" in the presence of the Holy One and the work of the Holy One in the midst of the people.

If the "work of the people" is to be at the same time the "prayer of the people," reverence before God must be a prime attitudinal stance of the assembly, and of all who minister within it. The presider especially, who is commissioned to lead the church's prayer, needs both to have and exhibit this sense of reverence as essential to his or her assigned ministry. Without this sense of profound reverence, liturgical action will appear empty, or at least hollow, and become a mere celebration of the human, not the human as ennobled and transformed by the holiness of God.

Christian worship names God as Father, Son and Spirit. Reverence for each name of God calls for a different stance. To name God "Father" is to name the "otherness" of God from whom all that is has its being. It is likewise to name the "creaturehood" of women and men, which, more than a statement of simple dependence, names as well the noble origin and noble destiny of humanity. To name God "Son" is to name the "historicity" of God, the fact of incarnation. In spite of this "otherness," God nonetheless has entered human history on its own terms: God has become a human person. All that is human has been, and is therefore capable of being, a history of God. To name God "Spirit," is to name the "indwelling" of God, the on-going incarnation that is the deepest truth of all human life, of all human history and indeed of all creation.

Reverence for the "otherness" of God invites excitement and wonder that the One who is beyond is not unknown, but rather One who speaks, relates and covenants in love. It also invites a humility that forbids enclosing the mystery in images, categories or doctrines that would limit and control rather than unveil God's gracious presence. Reverence for the "historicity" of God puts one beyond the never-ending categorical clash—human and divine—and invites men and women to pursue and be pursued by the human in God and the divine in themselves. Reverence for the "indwelling" of God invites everyone to see human life, and indeed all that is, as sacred, worthy of honor and respect, holy with the holiness of God. Christian worship to the Father with the Son in the Spirit is itself an act of wonder and awe that, more than the moon and the stars, invites and even urges the human cry: who are we that you be mindful of us; who are we that you care for us (Ps 8:4)?

(b) Reverence to the People Assembled. In both the OT and NT the people God chooses are called the holy ones of God (e.g., Num 16:7; 1 Pet 2:9). Holiness is both gift and vocation. "The Church, whose mystery is set forth by this sacred Council, is held, as a matter of faith, to be unfailingly holy. This is because Christ, the Son of God, who with the Father and the Spirit is hailed as 'alone holy,' loved the Church as his Bride, giving himself up for her so as to sanctify her; he joined her to himself as his body and endowed her with the gift of the Holy Spirit for the glory of God. Therefore all in the Church, whether they belong to the hierarchy or are cared for by it, are called to holiness" (G.S., 39).

The liturgy of the church gathers the church together. It is the visible manifestation and actual living out of the mystery of Christ (S.C., 2). Whatever the liturgical action, the people assembled are God's chosen people (G.S., chap. 2), visibly assembled as "the Mystical Body of Jesus Christ, that is, by the Head and his members" (S.C., 7), to carry out together "an action of Christ the Priest and of his Body, which is the Church" (ibid.).

Every liturgical action opens with some form of welcome and greeting by the presider. It is a human action, and therefore requires that the welcome and greeting be humanly true. Even more, however, it is a sacramental act: the human action is at the same time an action of Christ. It is Christ who gives both welcome and greeting in and through the human ministry of the presider. As a sacramental act, the greeting and welcome must be true to Christian faith as well. The presider cannot assume so elevated and detached a stance as to render Christ alien to his members, nor so casual a stance as to make Christ trivial, nor so insignificant a stance as to render him invisible. Presiders must have reverence for the ministry they carry out and for the mystery they embody in that ministry. At the same time they must so conduct their ministry as to invite reverence from the assembly for themselves, the ministry, and Christ.

There is another dimension of reverence to the welcome and greeting which ought to hold throughout the liturgical act. The people the presider calls to assembly are themselves the mystery of Christ. Vatican II named the assembly as one of four modes of Christ's presence in all liturgical prayer (S.C., 7). To call a people to assembly is, as it were, to "consecrate" them, to establish them in that unique relationship with Christ where they are so intimately one with him as to be his presence, his body. The assembled church is not a group, nor a crowd, nor even the most splendid of human gatherings. It is sacramentum, the visible embodiment of Jesus Christ. Presiders must likewise have profound reverence for the mystery they assemble by their welcome and greeting, and invite reverence of all for all.

The same may be said for those who proclaim the word, in reading, in homily, or in whatever form. Proclamation is a human ministry, and must therefore be humanly true. It is not to the deacon alone that the mandate is given: "believe what you read, preach (proclaim) what you believe, and put into practice what you preach" (said while entrusting the gospel to the deacon in the diaconate ordination rite). Those words belong as mandate to anyone who would proclaim the word. Yet the proclamation of the word is a sacramental act as well: "He (Christ) is present in his word since it is he himself who speaks when the holy scriptures are read in the Church" (S.C., 7). Both those who proclaim and those who hear need to be alive with wonder and awe that this human word so humanly spoken gives voice to Jesus Christ. As they walk to the place of proclamation, or carry the book of scripture in procession, and especially as they read or speak, proclaimers of the word will serve their ministry well who hold in profound reverence the scripture, their ministry of proclamation, and the people whose very lives give body to the word proclaimed.

(c) Reverence for the Liturgical Materials: Rites, Prayers, Symbolic Acts, Holy Objects. Liturgical action is made up of words and objects and symbolic human interactions whose purpose is to express, nourish and strengthen faith (S.C., 59). Each prayer, each ritual, each symbolic act and each object has as its purpose to embody and to unveil some dimension of God's saving presence and activity in and among God's people. Nothing is trivial. And nothing is at the free disposal of bishop, presider, liturgical minister, or liturgical assembly. Liturgical materials, be they the water or oil or food of Christian sacraments or the words of prayer, the incense to be burned, the candle to be carried or the vessel to be handled, are human realities that must be humanly true (e.g., "that the bread may effectively signify the meaning it is intended to convey, it must really look like food" (G.I.R.M., 283). They are likewise sacramentum, unveiling and serving to carry out the saving actions of Jesus Christ. They must therefore be true to Christian faith as well.

Reverence for liturgical materials acknowledges that they are human realities that are placed at the disposal of Jesus Christ, his prayer, his work and his presence among his people. Their meaning and purpose are guided both by their own human truth and by the truth of faith they serve. They are not used by people to express and give meaning to whatever people determine. They draw their meaning from the mystery of Christ proclaimed in scripture and enacted in the church's liturgy, and are used by people to express and be captured by this same mystery of Christ.

Liturgical materials are sacred, not in the sense of belonging to another world, but precisely because they belong to this one. They are sacred carriers of the mystery of God, who is Father ("otherness"), Son ("incarnate"), and Spirit ("indwelling"). Reverence is due to them because of the mystery they serve, and because of the awe and wonder that must arise when simple things, water, oil, food, sweet smells and not-always-eloquent words, are embraced by the Holy One, employed by the Holy One, able to allow the Holy One to be and work among us.

See Doxology; Assembly; Presidential style; Art, liturgical

Robert W. Hovda, Strong, Loving and Wise: Presiding in Liturgy (Washington: The Liturgical Conference, 1976). David Power, "Sacramental Celebration and Liturgical Ministry," in Liturgy: Self-expression of the Church, New Concilium, 72, ed. H. Schmidt (New York: Herder and Herder, 1972), 26-42. Peter E. Fink, "Perceiving the Presence of Christ," in Worship, 58, 1 (Jan. 84): 17-28.

PETER E. FINK, S.J.

RITUAL

The 20th century has witnessed a gradual, yet dramatic, shift in the understanding and appreciation of human ritual behavior. Ritual has increasingly become highlighted as an essential element in the development, integration and sustenance of the human person and the human social community. While once designated as a peripheral topic of scientific inquiry, ritual now commands significant attention in a wide range of scholarly disciplines, especially psychology, sociology and anthropology. Recent theological investigations in areas of sacramental and liturgical theology have likewise been keenly attentive to ritual studies and have been greatly enhanced and enriched by them.

Human ritual possesses four distinguishing characteristics. It is a behavior, which is repetitive, interpersonal, and value oriented. Ritual is a performance or activity. This behavior is not random but displays observable repetition both in its structural organization and its chronological framework. Every ritual develops a pulse or rhythm which is part of the larger life rhythm of a people.

Ritual is never individualistic or private. Ritual is the behavior of and within a community. Ritual always bears an indelible interpersonal and social stamp. As a repeated interpersonal behavior, ritual is purposeful. It seeks to attain a particular end or goal. Ritual allows contact with an event or person which called the ritual community into existence. Within this field of contact, the ritual participants are offered the possibility of once again encountering this event or person and embracing the meaning and values which are offered.

Ritual should not be confused with either rubrics or routine. Rubrics are mere stage directions. While they may be important to the proper execution of ritual celebrations, they are only a surface feature of the whole ritual ensemble. Routine, on the other hand, while it is likewise repetitive interpersonal behavior, either does not address significant human goals or values or has become impotent to do so.

Psychology and Ritual

Recent psychological research has underscored the centrality of ritual in the development, integration and maintenance of a stable human personality. Erik Erikson's ground-breaking research into the Ontogeny of Ritualization clearly demonstrated that the integration and stability of human personality requires the transmission, appropriation and integration of crucial social values and norms. The distinct chronological stages of development, identified as infancy, early childhood, play age, school age, adolescence, witness the corollary values of intimacy, discrimination of good/bad, dramatic elaboration, rules of performance and solidarity of convictions. In the earlier stages of development, biological needs call forth the appropriate values. In the later stages of development, the demands of social life require the intrusion of particular social values.

Each segment of personality development and integration is related to the others as an organic whole. While a "new" stage introduces a "new" value, it also re-enforces the values of earlier stages. Similarly, the balanced, mature and integrated personality of adult life is enriched and sustained by the continual encounter with these fundamental values.

How does a person experience the values which are crucial to personality development and integration? Where do adults continue to encounter these essential values throughout their lifetime? In both instances, psychology has identified ritual as the normal locale and medium. Through the interpersonal, repetitive and adaptive behavior of ritualization, individuals attain and preserve an integrated and healthy psycho-social existence. From a psychological viewpoint, ritual is a normal and necessary human behavior. The absence or severe truncation of ritual in the process of personality development can result in psycho-social personality disorders. Without ritual participation or appropriation of the values mediated by ritual activity, the human person faces potentially serious psychological conflicts, personality impairment and estrangement from inner self and outer society.

Ritual is well equipped to function as an appropriate means for the mediation of values. It possesses instructional, interpretive and indoctrinating elements which support this task. Ritual instructs by creating specific experiences for the developing person. Through the particular structure of ritual, the range of possible interpretations of the experience is narrowed. Gradually, ritual imposes the horizon or worldview of the community on those who participate in its rituals and fashions or indoctrinates them into one of its own.

Sociology and Ritual

Sociology has detected three essential elements in communities or social groups. They share a common language. They embrace appropriate common patterns of behavior. They construct social institutions or structures as a means of ordering and sustaining a common life. Ritual assumes an important role in each of these areas.

On first glance, language is a way to describe the world and our experiences. It is a faculty of communication, a power which enables us to build a common world. Deeper analysis shows, however, that language is more complex.

Language is a living human construct.

As such, it always includes within it the social community's fundamental presuppositions and prejudices. Furthermore, language always communicates information or content with a particular force. This force can exhort, demand, question or simply declare. Any analysis of language, therefore, requires concurrent attentiveness to both what was said (content) and to how it was said (force). When the linguistic dimensions of social prejudice, content and force are attended to, it becomes clear that the importance of language transcends its logical structure or correct usage. Language reaches deep down into the mystery of life. It not only endeavors to describe reality. It also attempts to express the meaning of reality.

Language's ability to disclose meaning is relative. At times, language appears adequate for the task. On other occasions, all our words seem to fall short. Ian Ramsey's analysis of religious language has helpfully addressed this linguistic ambivalence.

Ramsey identified two different categories of language or discourse: ordinary and odd. Ordinary discourse is the type of language we encounter in the normal course of our experience. It is the language of sharing information, transacting business or attending educational lectures. Ordinary discourse is successful at expressing the meaning present in ordinary events and experiences. There are, however, events and experiences which "stand out," "touch the depths of our hearts," "shake us from our usual manner of life." In relation to the "normal" unfolding of our lives, these "odd" events or experiences are super-charged with meaning that is extraordinarily real, yet mysterious. Every attempt to express the depth of meaning experienced in these "odd situations" in ordinary discourse falls short, is judged inadequate. Yet, the undeniable reality of our experiences demands that we try to explain, communicate and understand. Ramsey insightfully noted that we abandon "ordinary discourse" and utilize "odd language" to express the meaning of our "odd situation."

What makes "odd" language "odd"? The answer is not the content specified by the particular words of a sentence. Rather, "odd language" is characterized by how the content is modified or qualified. Usually, the content is qualified by concepts of infinity, uniqueness or absoluteness. In the sentence, "God is all knowing," the content "knowledge" ascribed to God is qualified by the absolute "all." Human beings understand knowing. Analogously, human beings can comprehend what it means to ascribe knowledge to God. Yet, the modifier "all" places God's knowledge beyond any exact literal definition.

In using "odd" language to describe "odd" situations or "odd experiences," the speaker is seeking to disclose a depth of meaning which resists ordinary explanation and comprehension. "Odd" language pushes human understanding to its "brink" or limit. In the "limit situation," human beings face experiences and their questions which evade complete answers from within our usual range of understanding. Yet, answers, even if partial, are demanded. Human beings construct "odd language" as a statement that a meaning and answer does exist, is really experienced. This meaning or answer, however, defies literal description or definition. Its proper linguistic expression is the arena of metaphor or "odd language."

Religious ritual language is odd language, the language of metaphor. It possesses five key characteristics: descriptive, heuristic, prescriptive, promissory and performative. Ritual language functions as a narrative or myth which offers an explanation or exegesis of ritual actions. This exegesis limits the range of interpretation applicable to ritual gestures/behavior by supplying a linguistic context within which the ritual performance should be understood.

Ritual language possesses a heuristic power. It arouses interest and evokes discovery of meaning and reality not immediately evident in ritual action. It invites the ritual community to turn to a transmitted chain of symbols. For example, during the celebration of the eucharistic liturgy one can detect the following transmission of symbols: priest-Christ-bread-Last Supper-crucifixion-resurrection-grace-life. The interaction of symbols and ritual language activates and intensifies the human potential for transcendence and its consequent discovery of meaning.

Ritual language is prescriptive. The meaning disclosed in the language/action of ritual is normative for the life of the ritual community. This meaning becomes a "rule" or "law" of social life. The normative force of ritual language/action is not the result of an external imposition by authority. On the contrary, it arises from the experience of meaning and truth experienced within ritual activity accompanied by its heuristic narrative.

Ritual language is promissory and performative. The meaning expressed and experienced in ritual elicits a commitment from the participants. This promise is to be incarnated in a life style which expresses the meaning embraced in the ritual experience. The promissory and performative dimensions of ritual language enhance community coherence and stability.

Ritual, by its very nature, structures human behavior. In achieving this goal, ritual fosters intra-group communication, social bonding, solidarity and common performance. By structuring behavior, ritual effects intimacy, social direction, interiorization and presence. Through social interaction, cultural symbols and the power of the human imagination, ritual enables a community to achieve contact with their origins, meaning and one another. The appeal to imagination is not a flight into fantasy. The human imagination is not merely one of the capacities of human beings. Imagination defines the human as human. It is an empowering and incorporating power of all other human powers. Imagination is the pervasive movement of the human person in life, confronted by experience and struggling to discover and create meaning. Imagination is the driving power of the human spirit seeking truth and reality. Imagination is concerned with the whole of life which continually evades partial answers. The world of symbols and ritual is the home of the human imagination.

In effecting intimacy, ritual must shrink spacial and temporal distances. In religious situations both a vertical and horizontal distance must be traversed. The human imagination projects a "God" who is above in a position of power and transcendence. It also projects a time continuum of past, present and future. Through the specific use of symbols and symbolic gestures, language and environment, ritual stimulates and focuses the imagination so that the distant God is experienced as present and the ritual community is "thrown back" to their origin or "charter event."

Proximity with God and the charter event allows the ritual participants to interpret their life-experiences within the fundamental meaning systems of their community. It also identifies "unfinished business." The community can discern where they have not lived up to or expressed the meaning which they claim as the basis for their life and actions. Having returned to their origins and been nourished by its deep meaning, the task of finishing unfinished business can be taken up with new enthusiasm and fortitude.

The intimacy attained through ritual is thoroughly social. In ritual, it is the social community which organizes social symbols and symbolic behaviors. This social character enters into the very efficacy of ritual. An individual is invited to surrender the control of their individuality and participate in a common experience of the community. In this process, there emerges a common imaginative insight which underpins a community experience and discernment of meaning which expresses itself in a shared community life and behavior system.

Ritual challenges the individual and community to interiorize or appropriate the foundational meaning of the community. The stimulation of the imagination through symbols and symbolic behaviors empowers it to critically grasp where individuals or the community at large have failed to make their own and live out the meaning which makes them who they are. At the same time, the imagination proposes new schemes through which this meaning can be more fully embraced and lived. Ritual does not allow its participants merely to play act. Ritual demands that role become autobiography.

The final component of ritual's patterning of behavior is presence. The performance of ritual activates a "directionality" in the human imagination. Symbols and symbolic actions can have an infinite variety of interpretations. The structuring of ritual, however, limits these interpretations by focusing the human imagination. There is one ultimate purpose to directionality: the attainment of presence. The presence attained through ritual is not imaginary or fanciful. It is the product of intimacy, social coherence and interiorization. Intimacy creates a feeling of closeness and reassurance which neutralizes noxious threats. Interiorization demands conformity to the fundamental meaning which called the community into existence and sustains its life. Together, within the ritual context of the living community, they render present the powerful "charter event" of the ritual community.

Anthropology and Ritual

Contemporary anthropology has persuasively argued that every culture possesses a root metaphor. A culture's root metaphor is the corporate ground and basis for a common interpretation of experience and from this, corporate life and action. Root metaphors are events, ideas or persons which a culture employs as an analogical tool to discover meaning in a world of ambiguity and conflict.

Root metaphors articulate the worldview or horizon of a particular culture. They are powerful presuppositions which permeate the multiple layers of cultural thought and life. The key medium for the expression and mediation of a culture's root metaphor is ritual. By examining a culture's ritual, one finds an entryway to the unconscious presuppositions upon which the very existence of the culture rests.

Cultures are not static entities. They are in a continual process of alteration and change which can be called the social drama. Root metaphors exercise several crucial functions in the process of cultural transformation.

First, root metaphors are born in the context of cultural transformation. The social drama commences with an action-event-person which is a breach of the established social order. The breach may intensify into a crisis. Two alternatives emerge. The culture will successfully answer the challenge of the "revolutionary" group or it will be forced to expel them from the community. In the former case, the expelled group will establish its own cultural world with its distinctive metaphor and central ritual.

Second, root metaphors set the interpretive parameters of culture. They constitute a hermeneutical horizon for articulating the meaning of life as experienced and lived within a particular culture.

Root metaphors function as positive norms of meaning. They continue to survive as long as they continue to "make sense" of life as lived within the boundaries of a culture.

Third, root metaphors are the basis for corporate coherence and group bonding. Root metaphors enhance "communitas," the interpersonal relationship of group members grounded in shared identity and experience. In its institutionalized form, communitas is dependent upon the ability of ritual to clearly express and make present a culture's root metaphor. A symbiotic relationship exists between communitas and ritual. In providing access to the community's charter event or root metaphor, ritual preserves and intensifies the experience of communitas and group solidarity by re-enforcing origin, meaning and purpose. The experience of communitas triggers ritual celebration.

Finally, root metaphors exercise a social corrective. The clear expression of a root metaphor in ritual challenges the ritual community to evaluate how successfully the community's behavior and institutions conform to and adequately express the meaning of their foundational metaphor. The ritual experience always issues a call to renewal, reform and correction. By answering this call, a culture will be equipped to undertake the growth, transformation and adaptations necessary for survival without losing its fundamental identity.

Conclusion

Ritual is endemic to individual and corporate life. It is a powerful medium for expressing the deepest meanings and values which make a people who they are. The strength, clarity and adequacy of ritual life are criteria by which the health and continued existence of a community can be assessed. Ritual is to be cherished as a life-sustaining system for individuals and their communities.

See Human sciences, sacraments and the

William Doty, Mythography: the Study of Myths and Rituals (University, Ala.: Univ. of Alabama Press, 1986). Roger Grainger, The Language of the Rite (London: Darton, Longman and Todd, 1974). Ronald Grimes, Beginnings in Rite Studies (Washington, D.C.: Univ. of America Press, 1982). Leonel Mitchell, The Meaning of Ritual (Wilton, Conn.: Morehouse-Barlow, 1977). Elaine Ramshaw, Don Browning, eds., Ritual and Pastoral Care (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987). Don Saliers, The Soul in Paraphrase (New York: Seabury, 1980). James Shaughnessy, ed., The Roots of Ritual (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1973). Victor Turner, The Ritual Process (Chicago: Aldine Pub. Co., 1969). Victor Turner, ed., Celebration: Studies in Festivity and Ritual (Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1982). George S. Worgul, Jr., From Magic to Metaphor (New York: Paulist, 1980).

GEORGE S. WORGUL, JR.

S

SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY AFTER VATICAN II

The most obvious thing to have issued forth from the Second Vatican Council in regard to the church's sacraments is the liturgical revision of the sacramental rites and the new directives that are given for their celebration. Perhaps less obvious, though no less significant, is the radical restructuring of the rhetoric employed both to name and to explore the meaning of sacraments. Pre-conciliar reflection in the West gave shape to the theology of sacraments according to the diptych "sacraments in general" and "sacraments in particular," where the former identified what the seven sacraments held in common, and the latter then applied these common notes to each individual sacrament. The language was structural and quasi-scientific. Post-conciliar theology departs from this tradition in several significant ways. The language now employed to explore what is common to the church's sacraments is liturgical rather than structural. Emphasis is on their relationship to the mystery of Christ and to the church as a whole, both of which are expressed in each liturgical act. The concept of sacramenta in genere has receded somewhat, and, if it is to be developed at all, it would be arrived at after consideration of individual sacraments in their uniqueness; it would not be the point of departure. Priority focus is given to the richness of each sacrament as a unique liturgical act, and to the relationship that exists among them in the sacramental life of the church. Symptomatic of this radical shift in rhetoric is the contrast between the way sacraments are identified in the 1917 Code of Canon Law and in the revised code of 1983. In the former they are listed under the heading de rebus (on things); in the latter, under the title "the office of sanctifying in the church."

This article presents a brief survey of the evolution in sacramental theology from its pre-conciliar scholastic garb to its contemporary theological "shape," where its language is liturgical, its methodologies are garnered as much from the human sciences as from philosophy, and where it has taken its place firmly in the arena of Christian spirituality. We will consider (a) the gains and limitations of scholastic sacramental theology, (b) the first level move from the scholastic mode to a more personal and phenomenological mode of discourse, and (c) a second level move into a more properly liturgical mode of discourse. Finally (d), we will suggest some tentative directions for the future.

Scholastic Theology

The scholastic methodology which dominated Catholic theology in the West from the 13th to the 20th centuries can rightly boast of a number of achievements in regard to the theology of sacraments.

It advanced the distinction between sacrament and sacramental, thus securing special significance for the (then) seven distinct liturgical actions that displayed and continued the saving mission of Christ. It struggled to preserve the effectiveness of these actions, and rooted this effectiveness firmly in the action of Christ. In an articulation that was not always correctly understood, it identified Christ's gracious presence and action as the "within" (gratia continetur) of the sacramental actions, and insisted that only two things were required for Christ to touch people effectively through them. Those responsible for enacting the sacraments had to do so according to the mind and intent of the church (ex opere operato), while those participating in sacraments as "recipients" (people ministered to) needed to do so with no obstacle placed in the way (ex opere operantis). In other words, fidelity to the church's actions and an openness to the ways of those actions allowed the saving grace of Christ to be appropriated by believers through the medium of Christian sacraments.

Scholastic theology employed a specific model in its reflection on and in its examination of the sacraments. It looked on them as "objective realities," quasi-scientific objects, which could be observed and analyzed from without. Appropriately it asked questions of sacraments that were fitting to scientific objects: who made it? where did it come from? what constitutes it to be what it is? when does it cease to be itself? who may use it? when? and for what purpose? This question set allowed theologians to weave together a well-wrought network of understanding which rooted the institution of sacraments directly, or at least indirectly, in the life of Christ, which insisted that these actions were indeed the actions of Christ, and which examined the conditions for and the effects of sacraments in relation to people. The heart of scholastic reflection was to see the church's sacraments as sacred objects (holy signs) given by Christ to be received by all through the ministry of some, usually ordained priests.

In spite of its achievements, however, scholastic sacramental theology labored under some severe limitations. It lacked a sound ecclesiological base, for it had replaced the Augustinian image of the totus Christus (Christ in the midst of the church, together with the church which is gathered to himself) by an image of Christus solus (Christ alone, present in the ministry of the priest, and acting on behalf of the people). The sacramental theology of the Scholastics also lacked a proper sense of the relation between word and sacrament, a deficiency that became particularly poignant during the 16th-century Reformation. A third burden was the conflation of the trinitarian structure of sacramental worship into a purely christological framework, with serious neglect of the role of the Spirit as the agent of transformation of all that is placed with Christ. Western theology paid a heavy price for having replaced the epiclesis of Eastern prayer with the verba Jesu of Ambrose. Finally, and with added force at the time of the post-Tridentine liturgical reform, scholastic theology lacked the sense of the liturgy itself as a theological locus. Liturgical forms were frozen to protect doctrine; they were neither seen as, nor given free reign to be, living expressions of the church's living faith.

It is this set of limitations, and the growing awareness by the mid-20th century that they were in fact limitations, that gradually exposed the scholastic mode of reflection as no longer adequate to the task of understanding the church's sacramental life. The awakening owed itself to a number of converging factors: the liturgical movement of the 19th and 20th centuries, the advance in biblical scholarship in both Protestant and Catholic circles, the non-scholastic theological ventures of M. de la Taille and O. Casel, and such official pronouncements from Rome as Mystici corporis (1943), which re-captured the church as Christ's Body, and Mediator dei (1947) which brought new focus to Christ himself as sole mediator between God and humankind.

Beyond Scholastic Theology

The first major step away from scholastic methodology was made by E. Schillebeeckx (Christ, the Sacrament of the Encounter with God, Eng., 1963). Drawing on patristic and biblical richness, Schillebeeckx re-established the proper sacramental relationship between Christ and the church, and identified this relationship as foundational to any theology of sacraments. Christ was present as one to be encountered in his primary sacramental manifestation, the church, and specifically in the church as it gathers for prayer and its sacramental acts. Schillebeeckx introduced a paradigm shift, a new hermeneutical lens through which to view sacramental faith and the sacramental tradition of the church. Moreover, in replacing the "object model" of scholastic reflection with the more phenomenological and experiential model of "human encounter," he turned sacramental theology away from the extrinsic quid pro quo language of economic exchange (do this and receive grace) to the interpersonal language of relational human experience. As a result, theology could no longer be content simply to be explanation of the church's faith (the fides quaerens intellectum of Anselm); it had to be seen in addition as "promise" (intellectus quaerens fidem), pointing to and unveiling a meeting with Christ that continues to unfold in the church.

Schillebeeckx set several things in motion which continue to influence theological reflection on sacraments. He broadened the resource base of sacramental theology by re-discovering, as it were, the biblical and patristic roots of the sacramental tradition. He introduced a distinction that had been seriously neglected in earlier sacramental reflection between the unique manner of existence that is peculiar to human persons and the objective mode of "being there" that is proper to things of nature. He insisted that religion is a saving dialogue between human persons and the living God, and that, according to the Christian confession of the incarnation, the God who addresses us does so as human among humans. By employing a personalist model for his theology, in contrast to the objective model of the Scholastics, he unveiled the fact that all sacramental theology employs models in its investigation of Christian worship. He thus opened the door for the employment of other models as well.

The rhetorical shift which Schillebeeckx effected in sacramental theology found a complement in the language employed at Vatican II, especially in the Constitution on the Church (Lumen gentium) and the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Sacrosanctum concilium). Both documents reflect the fruit of the liturgical and biblical scholarship that had been under way since before the turn of the century. Both secure the language of sacrament for the church in its relation to Christ, and both name the mystery of Christ as a mystery of personal presence in and to the church.

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy did not offer a new definition of sacraments. Rather, it began to speak of sacraments in a radically new way. It reinstated the primitive concept of liturgy as the work of the people, and it unequivocally included all of the sacraments firmly within its scope. The image of sacrament as "vehicle of grace administered by some to others" was quietly replaced by one more active and inclusive. Sacraments are not things at all, but lively expressions by the whole church assembled of its faith and its mission to embody and make accessible the saving work of Christ. The liturgy is "the outstanding means whereby the faithful may express in their lives and manifest to others the mystery of Christ and the real nature of the true Church" (S.C., 2). In addition, the constitution stated in a way that is both appropriate to and directed to human experience the time-honored tradition of sacramental effectiveness: "In the liturgy, by means of signs perceptible to the senses, human sanctification is signified and brought about in ways proper to each of these signs" (S.C., 7). If scholastic theology had labored to root sacramental effectiveness in the action of Christ, to the neglect of the way in which this effectiveness was achieved (i.e., significando, by signifying), Vatican II brought forward with remarkable force this complementary truth. The scholastic tradition insisted that sacraments effect what they signify; Vatican II demanded that sacraments signify all that they effect, because it is by signifying that sacraments are effective for those who enact them.

The initial impact of Sacrosanctum concilium on the church was to guide and direct the liturgical reform which it called for. Its primary first contribution to sacramental theology was to bolster the major insights advanced by Schillebeeckx and others (e.g., K. Rahner): the centrality of Christ and the church in sacramental reflection; the dynamic notion of sacrament as action; and the call for experiential language both to name the reality of sacraments and to describe the effects which sacraments have on people. Only later, when its initial pragmatic task was accomplished in the issuance of reformed liturgical rites, would the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy have an even more radical effect on the procedures of sacramental theology.

The decade or so that followed Schillebeeckx's introduction of a new model for sacraments can well be called the decade of models in sacramental theology. B. Cooke (Christian Sacraments and Christian Personality, 1968) and J. Powers (Spirit and Sacrament: The Humanizing Experience, 1973) drew insights from psychology and personality development to explore the question of meaning in sacraments and to name the process through which the sacramental experience might lead one. Cooke aimed to "explain the function of sacraments in the actual living of Christianity and in the development of the Christian person" (p. 10). The goal of all sacramental activity is the development of a mature Christian person; sacraments are formative. Powers, on the other hand, focused on the human experience that lies behind all sacraments. It is, in a first instance, the experience of "no-thingness" in the face of the Transcendent, and in the second instance, the experience of being drawn along the path of self-transcendence. The purpose of sacraments is to provide a new quality of consciousness and a new quality of living marked by an ever increasing freedom, hope, and possibility for love. If Cooke sees sacraments as formative of the mature Christian person, Powers sees them as transformative of human consciousness. For both, sacraments advance the quality of human life.

G. McCauley (Sacraments for Secular Man, 1969) employed a sociological model to unearth the human meaning which sacraments held. Sacraments are "secular gestures; they deal with secular reality; they promote a greater secularity than we are accustomed to associate with human existence; in themselves they embody secular experience" (p. 15). An enriched human life on the secular level is the fruit of sacramental worship. McCauley's model drew sharp attention to the human reality which underlies the church's sacraments.

A further insight of Schillebeeckx (God, the Future of Man, 1968) that the church is to be sacrament of dialogue with the world, coupled with his and Rahner's earlier perception of the church as sacramental embodiment of Christ present and active in the world, gained new force in the political model employed in the liberation theology of J. Segundo (The Sacraments Today, Eng., 1974) and others in Latin America. If the mission of Christ in the church is to thwart and overcome all forms of oppression among people, the church as sacrament of Christ must be about that saving business. In function of that mission, Segundo sees sacraments primarily as signs to the church of what it must be about, and they will be effective "to the extent that they are a consciousness-raising and motivating celebration of man's liberative action in history" (p. 55). If there is no raising of consciousness toward the liberative force of human action in the world, then, however perfect the ritual enactment of sacraments might be, there is no Christian sacrament to speak of. Liberation theology calls forth the ethical dimension of Christian sacraments.

Still other models were employed. The categories of process thought, for example, shaped B. Lee's investigation of church, sacrament and the structure of Christian experience (The Becoming of the Church, 1974), and raised to sacramental theology the need to speak of God, the church and Christian sacraments in the language of becoming rather than the language of being. In Great Britain, structural analysis, as well as considerations of the symbolic imagination, guided B. Brinkman (in The Heythrop Journal, 1972-1973) through his exploration of "sacramental man," and called attention to the experience of intimacy, interiorization, and social relationship as integral to sacramental prayer. Later, G. Worgul (From Magic to Metaphor, 1980) examined the ritual experience through the combined eyes of sociology and anthropology to draw out the relationship between sacraments, human life and social interaction.

In some ways the "model" approach continues to be employed in more recent theological works: e.g., D. Power (Unsearchable Riches, 1984) draws heavily on the "symbol" structure of P. Ricoeur and M. Lawler (Symbol and Sacrament, 1987) develops an understanding of sacrament as "prophetic symbol," but these show as well the influence of the second shift in sacramental theology since Vatican II, the movement from sacrament as theological concept to sacrament as liturgical act. They can therefore be considered both continuous and discontinuous with the first level shift which Schillebeeckx set in motion.

Beyond Sacramental Theology

The first movement away from scholastic sacramental theology raised the issue of meaning in experiential categories. It sought to relate Christian life and Christian worship within sacramental theology itself. This second movement continues that project, yet adds an additional dimension. The focus of attention is on the liturgical enactment of the sacraments, rather than on sacrament as an abstract theological concept. At this second stage, the term "sacramento-liturgical theology," or simply "liturgical theology" arises to name the theological venture.

One of the primary gains in this move from sacramental to liturgical theology is the recovery of the liturgical act itself as a theological locus. It has been classically known and accepted that faith gives rise to theology. In the first move from scholastic modes of reflection, it became equally known and accepted that theology must feed back into, and in some sense be verified in, the experience of faith. In this second move from sacramental to liturgical theology the liturgical act arises as the necessary intermediary between faith and theology. Paul Ricoeur's noted phrase, "the symbol gives rise to thought," is very much to the point. Faith gives rise to theology only after it finds its first articulation in the form of myth and symbol, i.e., the stuff of liturgical ritual. Conversely, theology does indeed return to faith by way of promise, but it is in the engagement with symbol and in the enactment of liturgical ritual that the promise is made, received and actualized. Liturgy expresses and manifests the mystery of Christ (S.C., 2); it is itself a primary statement of both theology and faith.

Liturgical theology is still very much in the process of being formed. It moves in a variety of directions. The shape of this dictionary itself bears witness to the many faces of liturgical theology, weaving together as it does the doctrinal, the biblical, the historical, the liturgical, the aesthetic, and the pastoral. Liturgical theology studies liturgical texts as privileged expressions of the church's faith. It examines as well the inner movements of faith which ritual action calls forth. It examines the correspondence between what is portrayed in ritual and what is lived by individuals and by the community. It calls on the arts, the human sciences, and pastoral experience as well as the more traditional sources of doctrine, philosophy and liturgical history. The liturgy of the church cannot be studied in isolation from the life realities and the faith realities which it both brings to expression and fosters. It is open to any source and any method which serves to link worship, faith and human life.

By holding the liturgy itself as a central theological locus, a new understanding of sacraments can emerge on the basis of what the church in fact does. There is an understanding of sacrament embedded within the ritual actions themselves. This realization led D. Power to advance fresh insight first into the theology of orders (Ministers of Christ and His Church, 1969) and, later, into the wider spread of ministers and ministries that are evolving in the contemporary church (Gifts that Differ, 1980). It guided J.B. Ryan to explore the eucharist from the texts of eucharistic prayers (The Eucharistic Prayer, 1974), a venture which was taken further for the ecumenical church by F. Senn (New Eucharistic Prayers, 1987). And it has guided a number of theologians to examine the various sacraments from the revised liturgical texts which present them to the church: e.g., A. Kavanagh (The Shape of Baptism, 1978) on the initiation rites; G. Austin (Anointing with the Spirit, 1985) on confirmation; J. Dallen (The Reconciling Community, 1986) on penance; C. Gusmer (And You Visited Me, rev. 1989) on pastoral care of the sick; and R. Rutherford (The Death of a Christian, 1980) on rites of Christian burial.

Liturgical theology is concerned, however, not only with ritual text, but also with the dynamics of ritual action which constitute the inner workings of the text. Exploring this terrain E. Kilmartin (in Eigo, 59-110) examined the word dimension of Christian sacraments and its intrinsic relation to the action that is both called forth from and empowered by its proclamation. R. Duffy (Real Presence, 1982) has studied the sacramental fare in terms of the human commitment which sacraments call forth and engender. Similar studies appear in the volumes of Alternative Futures for Worship (1987), esp. by J. Glen on the experience embedded in sickness and healing and by P. Fink on the process of conversion in reconciliation. Concern for dynamics also gave rise to new studies on the rhythms of liturgical time, e.g., M. Hatchett (Sanctifying Life, Time and Space, 1976) and T. Talley (The Origins of the Liturgical Year, 1986), and essays into liturgical spirituality, e.g., K. Irwin (Liturgy, Prayer and Spirituality, 1984).

Liturgical theology also seeks to intersect with issues and concerns in the broader field of systematic theology. Three works in particular deserve note. G. Wainwright (Doxology, 1980) offered a full systematic theology with specific and illustrative links drawn to corresponding liturgical texts. A. Kavanagh (On Liturgical Theology, 1984) presents a more finely focused systematic slice where the liturgical enactment of Christian faith is considered, not simply as one theological locus among many, but as the premier expression of Christian faith. Finally, E. Kilmartin (Christian Liturgy, 1988) delivers what may be seen as either a foundational theology for Christian worship or a liturgically based fundamental theology. His work stands in the tradition of sacramenta in genere, but unfolds on a much more profound level. In addition, voices from outside the traditional arena of systematics or liturgics contribute to the task: e.g., social moralist D. Hollenbach (in Haughey, 1977) who urges liturgical theology to recover its ethical dimension, and to include within its scope questions of faith, justice, and the community's social responsibilities.

There is a multi-faceted ferment within contemporary liturgical theology that only can be suggested in this essay. As the living church continues to experience its renewed liturgical forms, new issues and new areas of investigation will continue to shape its on-going task. The impact, for example, of liberation movements, of feminist theology and of liturgical evolution in non-Western, non-European parts of the globe is only beginning to make itself felt. These must be addressed by liturgical theology as well.

A Forward Look

It is safe to say that the future of liturgical theology will be both continuous and discontinuous with its present contours. Lines of continuity can more easily be drawn. Certainly liturgical theology will continue to be "liturgical," i.e., it will continue to learn from the liturgy as it is enacted by the living church. It will continue to explore the interface between sacramental rituals and the human life realities which those rituals presuppose and embody. It will continue to engage fundamental theological realities such as the trinitarian God, church, salvation and grace, and locate itself more firmly at the center of those investigations. It will continue to be enlightened by new modes of discourse, new paradigms and new methodologies. Points of discontinuity are harder to name.

One point of potential discontinuity lies in the introduction of local languages and customs into the liturgy and the encouragement given in S.C. 37-40 that the tradition be adapted to the various peoples of the world. It remains to be seen just how radical that adaptation will be, and what impact such adaptation will have. It could be that the process will simply issue forth in rituals that differ one from another only in nuance. It is equally possible, however, that adaptation will lead to ritual forms as different from the current praxis in the church as Gentile ritual differed from Jewish-Christian ritual, or as Byzantine ritual differs from Coptic, and both from the liturgies of the West. K. Rahner once named the contemporary moment in the church as the "emergence of the world church." If such be the case, it is reasonable to expect that emerging ritual forms at least could be unlike anything the church to date has known. If this were to happen, liturgical ritual as theological locus would present a radically new face to the church's faith and therefore present a radically new challenge to the liturgical theologian who seeks to understand that faith.

A second point of potential discontinuity depends on how seriously the church takes the symbolic nature of its liturgy, and how deeply theology takes

A. Kavanagh's assertion that liturgy is the "premier" statement of the church's faith. The place where this will impact the most is on the ecumenical reality of the church, and ultimately on the issue of church unity. To date, the ecumenical task seems to be the pursuit of church unity by reaching some level of agreement forged in bi-lateral and multi-lateral discussions. Agreement is sought on the level of doctrine, which is essentially the level of interpretation, and the task rests on the assumption that agreement can be reached. Yet, what if it were the case that agreement can and should never be reached; that unity should be sought on a level different from that of doctrinal agreement? If it is true that the nature of symbol demands a plurality of interpretations, it might well be discovered that the disunity which the churches are trying to overcome does not really exist, and, on the deepest level of the church's life and prayer, never did. Deep appreciation of the symbolic nature of ritual may force the church to confront the fact that, while different communities of Christians disagree as to what they think they are doing sacramentally, nonetheless, within a reasonable range of deviation based on culture, language, and perception, all Christian communities continue to do the same thing. The impact of such a realization on the theology of Christian worship, and indeed on Christian life and theology in general, would be enormous.

The future of liturgical theology remains essentially a task to be pursued: to explore the human events that are Christian sacraments both as human and as liturgical (i.e., as works of the entire assembled church); to penetrate ever more deeply the truth which faith names as the "within" of those events; and to draw lines of connection between sacraments and those realities of every day life which sacraments both draw on and point to. It must be done in many directions and on many levels at once.

Christian worship proclaims and enacts the transformation by God of human life, of human history, and of creation itself. The ways of liturgical theology can be no less than the ways in which humans seek to understand their life, their history and their world.

See Liturgical theology; Adaptation, liturgical; Aesthetics, liturgical; Culture, liturgy and; Doctrine, liturgy and; Feminism and the liturgy; Human sciences, sacraments and the; Imagination and worship; Inculturation of the liturgy; Liturgy and Christian life; Reform, liturgical, of Vatican II; Theologians, modern, and liturgical renewal

David Hollenbach, "A Prophetic Church and the Sacramental Imagination," in J. Haughey, The Faith That Does Justice (New York: Paulist, 1977), 234-263. Aidan Kavanagh, On Liturgical Theology (New York: Pueblo, 1984). Edward Kilmartin, Christian Liturgy (Kansas City: Sheed and Ward, 1988); also, "A Modern Approach to the Word of God and Sacraments of Christ," in F. Eigo, ed., The Sacraments: God's Love and Mercy Actualized (Villanova: University Press, 1979), 59-110. E. Schillebeeckx, Christ the Sacrament of the Encounter with God (New York: Sheed and Ward, 1963 [orig. 1960]). R. Vaillancourt, Toward a Renewal of Sacramental Theology, trans. M. O'Connell (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1979 [Fr. orig. 1977]).

PETER E. FINK, S.J.

SACRAMENTALS

The term sacramentals can change its precise meaning according to the starting point one adopts for building a theology of sacraments. We begin here with the present canonical definition of sacramentals in the Western church: "Sacred signs by which spiritual effects are signified and are obtained by the intercession of the Church" (C.I.C., 1166).

In this context, the word sacramental refers primarily to a "sign," i.e., an object or prayer that provides the occasion for a personal and "gracing encounter" with Christ. The sacramental relates to a sacrament. It is not itself a sacrament but it does bring with it the possibility of our being graced as a consequence either of the church's prayers or of private prayers approved by the church. Thus understood, some examples of sacramentals would be the use of holy water, rings that are blessed at a wedding, parents invoking God's blessing on their children, and so on. According to the rules laid down in church law (C.I.C., 1167-1172), the administering of sacramentals would normally be done by clerics but there are several cases where, rightly, they would be administered by lay people.

Historically, the concept of sacramentals understood as objects or actions "resembling" the sacraments was not firmly established until the 13th century; it was the Second Council of Lyons (1274) that named seven specific "sacraments" which then were considered to be instituted by Christ and to bring about, i.e., effect, what they signified. Other things such as the sign of the cross, blessed ashes, religious vows, had sometimes been called sacraments. From later medieval times, they were more clearly described as signs "pointing to" a reality rather than as actually "effecting" that reality. They were sacramentals.

The spiritual effect following from the use of a sacramental depends upon the intercession of the church. Underlying this assertion is, ultimately, the notion that the church, as the body of Christ (1 Cor 12:12-28) is so united with him that her actions and formally approved prayers have their own peculiar efficacy. The church, both "institutes" sacramentals and can nominate new ones (S.C., 79). The central Roman authority has held the right of granting approval to new sacramentals since the time of the Council of Trent; previously, the approval would more usually have come from a local bishop in response to a devotion or usage that had grown up in his diocese.

Quite often, under the influence of an older theology of sacraments, sacramentals were spoken of as "imitating" sacraments. It would be more common today to view them as "occasions" for the gracing process of the sacraments to take hold of us and for the Christ-life to deepen in us.

It is clear that, while the sacraments are richly symbolic, they cannot carry explicitly every nuance of Christian life and experience—a cogent reason, then, for using various sacramentals to assist in expressing particular dimensions of that life: for example, while the sacrament of the sick is a major event in the process of our becoming reconciled with our mortality, prayer and reflection before a crucifix, a sacramental relevant to that process, is a powerful aid for achieving that reconciliation. The church has relied very heavily in recent years on the sacraments and liturgical rites to carry by themselves the full meaning of encounter with Christ; this has often been at the expense of the warmth and richness of Christian daily life; a more general care for and use of sacramentals would go a long way towards integrating the sacraments with our overall growth in humane Christianity. Sacramentals, based on and relating to the church's sacraments, both prepare for and flow from the celebration of those sacraments. They are mutually enriching.

As signs, then, we would consider today that sacramentals can have a wider reference, namely to any object or prayer or action that can put us in touch with God's grace in Christ. Underlying this understanding of sacramental is the notion that Christ, the primary sacrament of encounter with God, renders the whole of creation new and redeemed. In this sense, while the church has nominated only certain actions as sacraments, there is "hardly any proper use of material things which cannot be ... directed toward the sanctification of men and the praise of God" (S.C., 61).

Bernard Cooke, Sacraments and Sacramentality (Mystic, CT: Twenty-Third Pubi., 1983). Thomas Marsh, "The Sacramentals Revisited" Furrow 33

(1982): 272-281. Karl Rahner, The Church and the Sacraments (NY: Herder and Herder, 1963).

PATRICK BISHOP, S.J.

SACRAMENTS

Though this essay deals with Christian sacraments, it is good to recall at the beginning that sacramentality is not monopolized by Christianity; it extends to all human experience. Basically, sacramentality involves three elements: (1) the ultimate meaning of human experience, (2) divine saving presence, and (3) some transformation of humans individually and communally.

(1) Whether in the context of Christian sacraments or in the broader context of world religions, sacramentality points to the fact that human life is distinctive because men and women exist self-consciously, that existence for humans is a sequence of experiences and that each of these experiences is what it is because of the particular meaning it has. To change that meaning is to change the experience. Religious sacramentality touches on the ultimate meaning of people's experience, that which confirms or challenges all other meaning.

(2) However, this ultimate meaning does not come originally from some abstract intellectual understanding, even though in some religions it may be expressed in formulated doctrines. Rather, the meaning comes from the presence of God, a presence that is the result of divine communication with humans through God's word of revelation and the human response in faith to that word. Because of God's being with and for humans, present to them in this mystery of divine self-revelation, there is a basic change in what it means to be a human person.

(3) Not only is the meaning of people's lives changed, but they as persons are radically transformed by this divine-human relationship. They are changed precisely through the altered worldview they now possess, through the new values and goals which that worldview provides and through the deeper motivation that flows from the relationship. This transformation which is effected by the religious sacramentality of human experience can be referred to as "sacramental grace."

Within that wider picture of sacramentality, Christian sacraments have a distinctive meaning and effectiveness because of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection. So, the very succinct description of Christian sacraments: "sacred signs, instituted by Christ, to give grace."

The Emergence of Christian Sacraments

Even during Jesus' public ministry his disciples were becoming aware that Jesus was bringing into being some new order of things, a new breaking into human history of "the Kingdom of God." He was providing a new perspective on God, his Father, and pointing to a new way of relating to God. However, it was only with the "Easter experience" after Jesus' crucifixion, i.e., with their awareness that Jesus was still humanly alive and mysteriously present to them in his Spirit, that these disciples slowly grasped the profound transformation of life's meaning that had occurred.

Gathering together, especially for communal meals, these first Christians shared with one another their awareness of this enduring Christ-mystery which changed the whole meaning of their lives and shared their recollections of Jesus' life and death. Slowly, too, they developed certain rituals to celebrate the new divine-human covenant that Jesus' death and resurrection had brought into existence. In particular they gave a special form to the practice of baptizing people and used it to initiate into the community those who accepted the gospel message, and they celebrated some special meals which quickly developed into "the breaking of the bread," the Christian eucharist. Though Jesus himself did not leave these rituals as such to his followers, it was his life and particularly his death and resurrection that "instituted these sacramental rituals" by being the mystery the rituals celebrate.

Early Christians, then, lived and prayed with the awareness of sharing in "the great mystery revealed in Christ," the mystery of God's saving presence to the lives of people. This was, in the full sense of the term, a "new life"; actually, it was the beginning of that unending life which Jesus had promised to those who would receive him as sent from his Father. Through the ritual of Christian initiation one entered into this new Spirit-life that came from Jesus' own passage into Spirit-filled risen life. As Paul explained in his letter to the Christians at Rome, in baptism one enters somehow into the death and resurrection of Christ and possesses the Spirit as the creative source of unending life.

It was this "great mystery" that was celebrated in "the breaking of the bread." Without yet reflecting on the way in which the eucharist "gave grace," the early decades—indeed the early centuries—believed that sharing the bread and wine become body and blood of the risen Lord was a continuing "food" for the new life that had begun with baptism. At the same time, they were aware that in "proclaiming the death of the Lord until he comes in glory" they were professing together their Christian faith. They were stating their acceptance of the preached gospel, but more than that they were pledging themselves to faithful living out of their Christianity. So, it was that the Latin word sacramentum (which meant "an oath, a solemn promise"), along with the earlier Greek word mysterion, came to be applied to these rituals, as well as to other Christian rituals like "ordination" or "reconciliation" which emerged in the life of the church.

Fairly early, however, another way of looking at the sacramental rituals came into existence and slowly gained ground. This was the instrumental view which considered the liturgical acts as means used by God, acting through the mediation of the ordained minister, to give grace to people. In this perspective Christians came to liturgy to receive sacraments, to be freed from their sins, to be blessed. This receptive approach to the role of the faithful coincided with their increasing exclusion from active participation in sacramental liturgy.

Throughout much of the first millennium the people's sense of involvement in the Christ-mystery through sacramental ritual remained quite strong, though with diminishing understanding of the mystery. For a variety of reasons, many of them having to do with the unsettled social situation of those days, the bulk of Christians received rudimentary religious instruction at best. This, plus the fact that Latin remained the liturgical language, while it was gradually becoming foreign to most people, meant that the level of theological insight into the reality of sacramental liturgy was minimal. So, by the 9th century and thereafter we find explanations of the liturgy, very many of them allegorical, which reflect the community's loss of understanding.

As the faithful had less and less of a role in the liturgical actions, as the language became strange to them, as the celebrant was situated at the far end of a sanctuary where he did "the sacred act," the sacraments and particularly the Mass became a spectacle which people attended. Obviously, this meant that the intrinsic significance of the sacramental liturgies no longer interacted with the significance of people's lives, except for the general outlook that something was given people through sacraments that enabled them to persevere amidst conflict with "the world, the flesh, and the devil" and so to reach their heavenly destiny.

In the 12th century a key development in the understanding and the practice of sacraments took place. As part of the overall intellectual struggle to understand things more clearly, there was an effort to clarify the nature of sacraments, if possible to arrive at a definition of "sacrament" that would permit people to say what was or was not a sacrament. This proved very difficult for an intrinsic reason: because the Christian sacraments cannot really be fitted into a category—technically speaking they are analogous realities—no strict definition of "sacrament" is possible. However, there was one element common to all the areas of Christian sacrament: by that point in history all of them, including marriage, involved a liturgical ceremony. As a result, it was the ritual action, for example, the wedding ceremony, that by itself was identified as the sacrament, and the focus of understanding Christian sacramentality became more limited than it had been in earlier periods of the church.

Because of an increasing awareness of the decline of liturgy, the late Middle Ages witnessed movements for reform, but these were not sufficient to ward off the explosive reaction of the Protestant Reformation in the early 16th century. On the positive side, the Reformation drew attention to the role of personal faith and the active participation of the faithful in sacramental liturgy; on the negative side, many of the Reformation churches downgraded the role of ritual and tended to substitute reflection on the Bible for sacramental celebration.

The Roman Catholic reaction to these Protestant tenets came with the Council of Trent (1545-1563) which provided the first systematized official statement about Christian sacraments. The teaching of Trent is of special importance because it has provided the framework and basic doctrinal positions for Catholic teaching about sacraments up to the 20th century. While the decrees of the council regarding sacraments need to be carefully studied and explained in the light of their historical context, a few of the leading notions can be mentioned here.

In the section that provides the general statements about Christian sacraments, the council insisted that Christ himself is the one who instituted the sacraments, though no explanation was given about the manner in which this took place—a later section specifically on the Mass linked the institution of eucharist with the action of Jesus at the supper and with his death. Countering the Protestant contention that "sacrament" could be applied in the true sense only to baptism and the Lord's Supper, Trent insisted that five other instances of liturgical celebration (confirmation, reconciliation, ordination, anointing of the sick, and marriage) were truly sacraments.

The heart of the debate between Catholics and Protestants dealt, however, with the efficacy of sacramental actions, specifically of baptism and eucharist. Consistent with their basic teaching about justification, namely that sinners though forgiven become "just" only in the next life, the Reformers looked on sacramental liturgies as proclaiming Christ's promise of human salvation but not yet transforming the people by grace. What liturgy did was to announce the gospel message so that people's faith might be aroused and increased; sacraments did not give grace, they only promised it.

Opposing this view, the Council of Trent insisted on the intrinsic grace-giving power of sacraments. "Sacraments contain and give grace." While its decrees took explicit account of the need for proper dispositions, including faith, in those who receive sacraments, the council viewed the sacramental liturgies as possessing in themselves a saving power that derives from the death of Christ. When properly performed by a celebrant who has the basic intention of accomplishing what the church intends in its sacramental acts, a sacrament has ex opere operato the power of conferring grace.

The term ex opere operato has been a key element in Roman Catholic sacramental teaching and in much Protestant disagreement with that teaching. If understood accurately, it refers to the belief that whenever the essential elements of the rite are carried out by a minister with a serious intention, the action, because it involves the agency of the risen Christ and his Spirit, possesses intrinsically the power of transforming people by grace. Unfortunately, the term has often been misunderstood to imply that sacramental effectiveness is automatic and independent of the care or understanding with which it is enacted or of the faith or devotion of those involved. Clearly, such was not the intention of the Council of Trent, nor do its decrees suggest such an interpretation.

Little changed in either official teaching or in popular attitudes regarding sacramental liturgies between the Council of Trent and the mid-20th century. However, the experience of the two great world wars and the convoking of the Second Vatican Council have opened up a new epoch in the life of Christianity and have led to a deepened interest in the role of liturgy in Christian life and to a creative development of sacramental theology.

The Nature of Christian Sacraments

What is becoming increasingly recognized is that "sacrament," even "Christian sacrament," refers to much more than religiously identifiable practices such as baptizing people. Vatican II pointed to this when it spoke of the church, i.e., Christians in the entirety of their lives and activity, as the fundamental sacrament. All the basic experiences that comprise the fabric of people's lives—birth, growth into adulthood, sickness and suffering, love and friendship, success and failure, caring for one another, sin and reconciliation, and in a special way death—are meant to be transformed by what has happened in the life and death and resurrection of Jesus. In all these areas, ritual has an important, indeed an indispensable, role to play; but effective rituals do not function apart from that which they ritualize. It is the entire experience with a particular focus on the ritual moment that deserves the name "sacrament."

Central to the effect caused by sacramental liturgies is the transformation of the meaning of people's experience. While a key area of human living, e.g., marriage or sin and reconciliation, is changed in its entirety by the meaning coming from the life and death and resurrection of Jesus, it is the ritual that formally states this meaning and relates human life to the significance of Jesus' saving action. As modern social and psychological study has given us a clearer and deeper understanding of the role that meaning plays in human experience, we begin to see how basic to the process of "grace" is the meaning given to life by any Christian individual or community.

Traditionally we have seen baptism as the first exposure of an individual to this new Christian meaning. Now we are regaining more awareness of the community dimension: we are more aware that the liturgy of Christian initiation, begun in baptism and complemented in confirmation, is entry into a community that is constituted by faith in the saving power of Jesus' death and resurrection. Christian initiation involves a process of communication and sharing that is meant to continue throughout people's lives: the community shares with the baptized its faith vision of human life, its belief that life finds an ultimate explanation through the significance of Jesus' Passover; and the newly baptized shares publicly in the ritual his or her commitment to Christian faith, life and discipleship.

Because it is not an abstract understanding of life that has been radically changed by Jesus' Passover, but rather the entire psychological response of imagination and motivation and free choice along with intellectual insight, the baptismal commitment embraces the whole of a person's future life. The ritual of initiation is intended to be a revelation, a revelation of what it means to be human, a revelation of the role of Christ and of Christianity in history, and most basically a revelation of the God revealed in Jesus. In the ritual the neophyte professes acceptance of that revelation and begins a life-long process of interiorizing more deeply the truth of that revelation and of living out its implications amid the changing circumstances of life.

Instead of being simply actions done to a person by an ordained minister, baptism and confirmation are meant to be joint actions of the individual who is entering the community by professing faith and of the community that is receiving this new member. And since the Christian community into which the newly baptized is being received exists as "body of Christ," the person is joined to the risen Lord in the mystery of "the whole Christ"—he or she becomes Christian. This is a human social reality; but it is more than that, for "body of Christ" expresses the mystery of the church existing as a living unity whose animating principle is the Spirit breathed out in history by the risen Christ. In the initiation liturgy the baptized shares that Spirit by which the church lives and ministers to the world.

However, for those baptized in infancy, which today is the more common practice, involvement in the sacramentality of the Christian community begins even earlier than the ritual of baptism. The child born of a Christian couple who are truly living out their faith is from its earliest moments exposed to the faith of its parents. The love experienced by the infant, the love of each parent in the critical process of bonding, is essential to the child's healthy psychological development. But the environment of the home, the love or lack of it between the parents, the harmony or strife among the siblings—all of which share in the sacramentality of Christian marriage, also have a deep effect on the infant for good or ill. Though it will be years before the child's own awareness of self and world will be developed enough to share explicitly the parents' faith, that faith is already being instilled into the child's consciousness at the level of implicit impression.

Realizing this makes us aware of the very basic role of marriage in Christian sacramentality. In a true sense, marriage is the most basic area of human and Christian sacramentality, for its significance deals precisely with relationships among humans, and above all with the saving and humanly enriching relationship of love and friendship. Christian marriage does not contain the whole of this sacramentality; it is not a sacrament in isolation. Within the broader saving sacramentality of human love it is a special paradigmatic instance of transforming love between two Christians who in a unique way share their faith, their daily routine of life, their goals, their concern for others, their selves.

The wedding ceremony plays a distinctive role within the sacrament of marriage; it is the public commitment to the relationship. The essence of the sacrament is, however, the two persons wedded to one another. Marriage is a process, an unfolding relationship between two persons that gives expression to the saving self-gift of Jesus in his death and resurrection. The life-long love and care for one another expressed by a Christian woman and man is meant to find a deeper meaning by the couple's insight into the way in which Jesus' death as passage into new life throws light on the sacrificial self-giving their married life requires. Conversely, the experience each has and the experience they share of striving to be for one another in mature fashion and the experience of personal growth that emerges over the years as they work out a shared destiny provide a realistic understanding of what Jesus has done in his self-giving redemptive action.

Though Christian marriage has long been acknowledged as a sacrament, it is only recently that some theologians have drawn attention to the sacramentality attached to the broader experience of friendship into which marriage fits. In many instances, the love and concern between friends functions as a genuine, even if not religiously formulated, revelation of what the saving love of God is all about. Among a group of people who are believing Christians, the transforming experience of human love finds deepened expression because of their sharing faith in the risen Lord. Their Christianity is a lived-out deepening of their humanly rewarding and enriching experience of true friendship. Marriage, then, does not enjoy a monopoly on the sacramentality it shares in distinctive fashion; rather, its role within Christian life is to provide insight into the way in which love among humans is meant to mirror the God revealed in Jesus as the Christ, a God who so loved the world that he sent that Christ to give humans unending life.

Desirable as is this picture of humans bonded together in friendship, it is somewhat idealistic. The reality of life, even Christian life, is that humans are incapable of constant and unqualified fidelity to such relationships. We exploit one another, we betray one another, we use others for our own earthly benefit, we hurt one another, and we often end up alienated from one another as individuals and as groups. Quite simply, we sin against one another.

Sin, though, is not meant to triumph; it is not meant to have the last word. Jesus' saving work was directed precisely to the overcoming of sin, and that means to the reconciliation of humans to one another and to God. Christian life should be, then, the experience of loving relationships maintained despite wounds to the friendship, wounds that have healed through honest recognition of one's own need for forgiveness and through genuine willingness to forgive the other. Reconciliation is meant to be a hallmark of Christian community existence; it is practically equivalent to peace.

Just as the broader reality of human friendship is sacrament, so is the fundamental experience of Christians living reconciled with one another. It is what speaks of the divine forgiveness that led to Jesus' reconciling death and resurrection. As in other major areas of experience, there is a place—indeed a need—for ritual expression of individual and social reconciliation, and so sacramental liturgies of reconciliation have been prominent in the church's life. Today's revision of the liturgy of reconciliation is but the latest stage in the enduring Christian task of injecting the healing significance of Jesus' death and resurrection into the constant need of reconciliation in human life.

While Jesus' healing ministry and the healing ministry of the church in history deals primarily with the spiritual aspects of human existence—with overcoming error and ignorance, instilling trust and hope instead of fear and suspicion and prejudice, leading humans to love rather than to hate, overcoming the power of sin—it does not neglect human bodiliness. So, among the sacramental liturgies of the church there is the anointing of the sick. Linked with other healing ministries practiced by physicians and nurses and psychologists and all those who care for the infirm, the Christian sacrament of anointing is meant to put human suffering into context, to give it a meaning it could not have apart from the life, death and resurrection of Christ, and to make it more bearable through the Christian community's personal support to which the liturgy points.

All Christians are meant to share in the task of ministering to those in need, whether that need be economic or social or physical or psychological or religious. Discipleship is a responsibility intrinsic to identity as a baptized Christian. Christians are to care for one another as well as for other sister and brother humans; and this care is a key manifestation, or sacrament, of the divine care. Historically, there was a tendency to limit this sacramentality to the ordained, the holy orders; today there is a growing recognition that while the ordained do have a distinctive ministerial role, the sacrament of Christian ministry is not limited to them.

The eucharistic celebration, the Mass, has always been recognized as the high point and focus of Christian sacramentality. It is in this ritual, whose enactment clearly goes back to the earliest generation of Christians, that the significance of the other areas with which sacraments deal—initiation, death, reconciliation, family, friendship, healing, ministry—are most sharply and explicitly related to the continuing mystery of Christ. It is in the eucharist that Christians are challenged by the proclamation of the gospel to assess the meaning of their lives and their implementation of that meaning. It is in the covenant commitment intrinsic to the eucharistic action that people face an ongoing invitation to deeper faith and more active discipleship. It is in the eucharistic ritual that, other things being equal, Christians are meant to become most aware of the saving presence of the risen Lord and the transforming, i.e., grace-giving, activity of his Spirit.

Because Roman Catholics for so long had thought in very limited fashion about Christ's presence in eucharist, fixing their attention almost wholly on "the real presence" connected with the consecrated elements of bread and wine, there is need today to broaden the understanding of God's saving presence through sacraments and specifically through the eucharistic celebration. Modern behavioral and social sciences have helped a great deal to make clearer the nature of personal presence, its connection with processes of communication, its dependence upon people being consciously for one another, its fundamental independence from spatial location; and all this has found application in recent theological attempts to explain the presence of the risen Christ in eucharist.

Basically, presence is a matter of one person being aware of another as a result of some form of communication between them. When someone speaks to me, that person is present in my awareness, even though quite obviously their spatial location is somewhere outside my consciousness. And how that person is present to me is determined by what they say or do—or to put it another way, the communication from which the presence results comes from use of some symbol such as language or gesture. The deepest level of presence exists when, through whatever symbols are most appropriate, persons truly share themselves as the persons they are with those they love. This is the kind of presence that is involved in Christian sacraments when the symbolic actions of Christians as they express their relationship to the risen Christ and to one another function also as the symbols through which God becomes present to people through self-sharing in word and Spirit.

Personal presence is not a static reality; as we suggested, it is not "being somewhere." Instead, because it is people being for one another, most specially in friendship, it is a creative force in human life. People become what and who they are through their relationships, through being for others and having others be for them. Christians believe that the ultimate and most creative instance of this occurs in the divine saving presence to humans. Because of God's saving presence in the risen Christ and their Spirit, people are transformed as people beyond what would otherwise be possible; divine friendship realizes a potential for existing personally that would not otherwise be even known.

This transformation of persons under the impact of divine presence, of God being for them, is what traditionally has been called "sanctifying grace"; and because this occurs through the changed sacramentality of human experience, the term "sacramental grace" points to the effect of sacraments on people's lives. So, as the Council of Trent insisted, the sacraments through which God is made present to believing Christians do "contain and give" grace; for the entirety of human life is—if its meaning is deepened by the meaning revealed in Jesus' death and resurrection—filled with the transforming presence of God.

W. Bausch, A New Look at the Sacraments (Mystic, CT: Twenty-Third Publ., 1983). B. Cooke, Sacraments and Sacramentality (Mystic, CT: Twenty-Third Publ., 1983). M. Downey, Clothed in Christ (New York: Crossroad, 1987). M. Hellwig, The Meaning of the Sacraments (Dayton: Pflaum, 1972). A. Kavanagh, On Liturgical Theology (New York: Pueblo Publ., 1985). D. Power, Unsearchable Riches (New York: Pueblo Publ., 1984). Message of the Sacraments, series ed. by M. Hellwig, (Wilmington: Michael Glazier).

BERNARD COOKE

SACRAMENTS IN THE EASTERN CHURCHES

Introduction

Vatican II's decree on ecumenism (Unitatis redintegratio) acknowledged the distinctive role of Eastern churches not in full communion with Rome (13-19). It asserted that: "... from their very origins the churches of the East have had a treasury from which the church of the West has drawn largely for its liturgy, spiritual tradition, and jurisprudence. Nor must we underestimate the fact that the basic dogmas of the Christian faith concerning the Trinity and the Word of God made flesh from the Virgin Mary were defined in ecumenical councils held in the East" (14). It also commended the East's stress on worship, noting that "these churches, although separated from us, yet possess true sacraments, above all—by apostolic succession—the priesthood and the Eucharist, whereby they are still joined to us in closest intimacy" (15).

In regard to Eastern churches already in full communion with Rome, the council devoted an entire decree, Orientalium ecclesiarum, which commends their sacramental life and practices. Vatican II "... confirms and approves the ancient discipline concerning the sacraments which exist in the Eastern [Catholic] churches, and also the ritual observed in their celebration and administration, and wishes this to be restored where such a case arises" (12).

A major result of recent improvement in ecumenical contacts between Roman Catholics and Eastern Orthodox has been the establishment of a Joint International Commission for Theological Dialogue. Since its first session in Patmos and Rhodes in 1980, the commission has already met five times (as of 1989) and published three consensus statements on the sacraments: the Munich (1982), Bari (1987), and New Valamo (1988) agreements.

Who are "Eastern" Christians?

The designation "Eastern" (or "Oriental") churches has become a customary way of identifying that large number of Christian churches whose distant origins are rooted in Eastern regions of the ancient Roman Empire, as opposed to the Western or Latin-speaking regions that included Italy, Spain, Gaul and Africa. These Eastern churches emerged from the ancient sees of Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem and the "New Rome," namely Byzantium or Constantinople. Today many members of these Eastern churches live in the Western "diaspora." In contemporary usage Eastern churches are classified in four groups: (a) the Oriental Orthodox churches, (b) the Eastern Orthodox churches, (c) the Assyrian church of the East, and (d) the Eastern Catholic churches in full communion with the church of Rome.

(a) The Oriental Orthodox churches have also been known in the past as the Ancient Oriental, the pre-Chalcedonian, the non-Chalcedonian churches, or even the Lesser Eastern churches. Their members have been incorrectly labeled as "Monophysites." The Oriental Orthodox churches are a communion of five distinct ancient churches of the East: Armenian, Coptic (Egyptian), Ethiopian, Syrian ("Jacobite"), and Malankar (Indian).

(b) A very small group of Eastern Christians is called the Assyrian church of the East, an East Syrian church which originated in Palestine, grew in Antioch and Edessa with only minimal Greek influence, and which flourished in the Persian Empire. At a synod held in A.D. 484 this church adopted the Christology of Nestorius.

(c) The third and most extensive group of Eastern Christians belongs to the Orthodox church made up of churches associated with the four ancient patriarchates of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem and to which in modern times has been added Moscow. They comprise the largest part of Eastern Christianity. What unifies the Orthodox church besides its adherence to scripture and the ancient Christian creeds is acceptance of the teachings of the first seven ecumenical councils.

The various churches among the Eastern Orthodox are commonly subdivided according to the following designations: the autocephalous (or autonomous) churches, associated with the patriarchates or churches of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, Russia, Romania, Greece, Serbia, Bulgaria, Georgia, Cyprus, Poland, Albania and Czechoslovakia as well as several independent canonical and irregular non-canonical churches. Because the Orthodox, especially those following the Byzantine liturgy, make up the majority of Eastern Christians and are the most influential theologically, this article often cites their sacramental practices.

(d) The fourth grouping of Eastern churches are the Eastern Catholic churches in full communion with the church of Rome. These have also been known by the perjorative term "Uniate" churches, a designation nowadays usually avoided. These churches have tried to maintain their original traditions and practices, but have sometimes undergone various degrees of Latinization. These Eastern Catholic churches usually have either a counterpart in the Oriental Orthodox, Eastern Orthodox, or the Assyrian church of the East. Among those related to the Oriental Orthodox are: the Armenian Catholic, the Coptic Catholic, the Ethiopian Catholic, the Syrian Catholic and the Malankar Catholic churches; those related to the Orthodox churches of Byzantine traditions: the Melkite Catholic, the Ukrainian Catholic, the Ruthenian Catholic, the Romanian Catholic, the Greek Catholic, the Bulgarian Catholic, the Slovak Catholic, the Hungarian Catholic. Corresponding to the Assyrian church of the East are the Chaldean Catholic church and the Malabar Catholic church. The Maronites and Italo-Albanian Catholics have no counterparts among the Orthodox.

General Remarks

It is not possible in this article both to explain in detail the basic similarities of sacramental practices and to enumerate the rich diversity of Eastern sacramental theology and practices. For specific treatment of a particular Eastern church, a scholar would need to consult specialized research.

Bishops and theologians of the Orthodox church and the Roman Catholic church have been involved in the last decade in explaining how the two churches express the faith in continuity with the apostles. Both churches understand themselves as a communion of faith and sacraments, preeminently manifested in eucharistic celebrations presided over by an ordained bishop or priest. Catholics and Orthodox in the 1988 New Vaiano consensus statement agreed that "...on all essential points concerning ordination, our churches have a common doctrine and practice, even if on certain canonical and disciplinary requirements, such as celibacy, customs can be different because of pastoral and spiritual reasons" (30).

The two churches now wish to present their sacramental beliefs in theological language that avoids Western Scholastic or Eastern Palamite categories. The new sacramental theology being formulated together draws upon scriptural, liturgical and patristic language. Since the Eastern churches did not undergo a Renaissance, a Reformation or an Enlightenment, they have preserved some ancient traditions forgotten in the West but have not elaborated a systematic sacramental theology. The church of Rome and the Eastern Orthodox church recognize their basic credal affirmations on the sacraments as the same, despite the fact that the Orthodox are often puzzled, troubled, and unwilling to imitate some practices of Rome.

To refer to the sacraments, Eastern Christians use the word derived from the Greek word mysterion, the holy "mysteries." Eastern Christians speak of participating in the sacramental life of the church rather than "receiving" sacraments. What are seen as making present and partially accessible, in sensible form, the invisible reality of God's love expressed in trinitarian life through encounter with the Incarnate Word are the holy mysteries or sacraments. Christian sacramental life is a salvific union with the glorified Christ by participation in the mystery of the heavenly liturgy.

Roman Catholics note that Eastern Christians often do not use their distinction between sacraments and sacramentals. For Eastern Christians sacramental living means participating in the mystery of the incarnation through gestures and activities which, even if practiced in the home, are linked with the church's liturgy. Numerous blessings connected with foods, water, and holy places are seen as possessing a kind of sacramental function that fosters ecclesial communion and turns the believers' minds to the heavenly liturgy where Christ intercedes without end.

Two religious practices of Eastern Christianity strongly color their sacramental life and should be noted even if, in the West, these practices are not considered directly sacramental. These practices are fasting and veneration of icons.

Through fasting Eastern Christians blend daily living with the liturgical calendar. Four major fasts are celebrated each year: Lent (seven weeks before Easter); the apostles' fast (the second Monday after Pentecost to June 28); the fast of the falling asleep of the Theotokos (August 1-14), and the forty days' Christmas fast (November 15 to December 24). Fasting in the Eastern tradition is measured more by what is not eaten rather than by amounts. On most days in Great Lent and Holy Week not only is meat not allowed but neither fish nor animal products (milk, cheese, eggs, etc.), and wine and oil are also excluded. Eastern Christians do not use the distinction found in the West between fasting and abstinence. Observing fasting regulations in the modern living conditions of the diaspora is not always feasible. One of the preparatory commissions planning position papers for the forthcoming Great and Holy Synod of the Orthodox Church proposes to adjust fasting requirements. Fasting is not seen as punishment of the flesh but as a gesture used to open oneself more fully to the presence of the Holy Spirit.

Secondly, through veneration of icons Eastern Christians are to enter into the spiritual realities signified by the sacraments. Eastern Christians venerate a spiritual presence in these religious paintings which Westerners would never associate with statues, stained-glass windows, or holy cards. In the West there is neither an equivalent of icon veneration (proskynesis) nor iconic incorporation into the liturgy as in the East. By the incarnation of the word, the image of the Father (2 Cor 4:4), God's image is seen as being restored in every human being. The material world is viewed as sanctified and again capable of mediating divine beauty. Icons express, as far as can be, the glory of God seen in the face of Christ. And so icons are judged to be sacred words in painting or the "visible gospel." An icon is not a random decoration but an integral part of the church's life and worship. Production and use of icons are always controlled by theological criteria. The location of the iconostasis (the screen that displays the principal icons), the screen's doors, the shape of the sacred vessels, and even of the church building contribute to the liturgical interplay between the visible and the invisible reality.

The Number of Sacraments

The doctrine of the "seven sacraments," to the extent that it exists in the East, has been influenced more by the West than by Eastern theology. As is well known the seven-fold listing of the sacraments emerged in the West during the 12th century and became official only in the 13th. In the East it appears for the first time in the Profession of Faith which Pope Clement IV required of Byzantine Emperor Michael Paleologus in 1267. The East has never committed itself to any specific list of sacraments such as the Roman church did at the Council of Trent. For pedagogical reasons and to facilitate dialogue with the West, Eastern churches make use of the teaching that there are seven sacraments. At the same time some consider other rituals as sacraments such as monastic profession, anointing of monarchs, burial of Christians, consecration of church buildings, etc.

Baptism/Chrismation

Among Eastern Christians infant baptism and chrismation are celebrated together and are seen, with the reception of eucharistic communion (received from a golden spoon containing consecrated wine), as the sacrament or sacraments of initiation. Baptism and chrismation are deemed to belong together as the Resurrection and Pentecost. Important for the Eastern churches is the sequence of sacramental initiation: baptism, chrismation, eucharist. Eastern Christians are puzzled, even shocked, at practices now common in Roman Catholicism: (a) of not observing the ancient sequence by allowing children to receive the eucharist before chrismation, and (b) of "depriving" baptized infants of eucharistic communion until the "age of reason." All the parts of Christian initiation in the East are administered by a priest. The liturgy begins with the blessing of the water which symbolizes the whole realm of matter. The Byzantine formula of baptism is pronounced not in the name of the minister as in the West ("I baptize you..."), but rather by declaration on behalf of the baptizand ("The servant of God/handmaid of God is baptized..."). The East retains triple immersion although the infant is not usually totally submerged. In Greece the infant is baptized between the ages of one and two years and remains unnamed until baptism. The role of the sponsors still has strong religious and social functions.

Catechetical material explaining the Eastern liturgy of baptism does not stress a relationship between the sacramental baptism and the remission of original sin. The predominant emphasis is on entry into the body of Christ. The Orthodox do not accept baptism administered by an unbeliever who acts on behalf of the church. The minister of the sacrament must be a believer; there is even reluctance to consider a baptism as performed properly when done by a lay person.

Chrismation is seen as sign of the seal of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38). Unlike the normal practice in the Roman church, chrismation is not reserved to the bishop although the myron (chrism) used to anoint the person has been blessed by the bishop who thereby maintains a link with the liturgy.

The Eastern Orthodox do not use the terminology of Roman Catholic theology regarding an "indelible character" for confirmation or chrismation. They commonly confirm/reconfirm those entering the Orthodox church, even from Catholicism, as a sign that a baptism performed under irregular circumstances, outside the canonical boundaries of the church, is now regularized through this sealing. As have Roman Catholics, the Orthodox have sometimes practiced "re-baptism" of those previously baptized in another church. But by the principle of "economy" (oikonomia) an Orthodox bishop may declare as objectively administered something administered outside the boundaries of Orthodoxy.

Eucharist or Synaxis

This essay can not give an account of all the eucharistic liturgies or families of eucharistic anaphoras within the Eastern churches nor can it provide a summary of the specific theological explanations used to explain the structure and significance of eucharistic prayers.

Both Catholics and Orthodox agree on the meaning of the eucharistic celebration. The eucharistic celebration is the memorial (anamnesis) of Christ's work as Savior. The eucharistic sacrifice is seen as involving the active presence of Christ the High Priest, acting through the Christian community presided over by the bishop or persons delegated by the bishop to celebrate the eucharistic mysteries. In the eucharistic celebration believers not only commend themselves and one another to Christ but also accept the diaconal mandate of the gospel to mediate Christ's salvation to the world. God the Father is seen as sending the Holy Spirit to consecrate the elements of bread and wine so as to become the body and blood of Jesus Christ for the sanctification of the faithful. The Holy Spirit transforms the sacred gifts into the body and blood of Christ in order to bring about the growth of the body which is the church. In this way the entire celebration is an epiclesis which at certain moments becomes more explicit. The church may be said to be continually in a state of epiclesis (see Munich document, 12-16).

In the Byzantine liturgy and in most Eastern liturgies the bread used in the eucharist is leavened bread (i.e., bread made with yeast). In the Roman rite unleavened bread (azyme) is used. A specially prepared loaf of bread is cut into cubes in the preparatory rites of an Eastern liturgy. Communion under the double form of bread and wine is distributed from the chalice in which the eucharistic bread, soaked in eucharistic wine, is administered by the priest to the communicant from a golden spoon.

Today there is a notable difference between the Eastern Orthodox and the Roman Catholics regarding the frequency of reception of the eucharist. Orthodox believers out of reverence observe certain practices before approaching the table of the Lord: receiving the sacrament of reconciliation, fasting for several days before reception, neither eating nor drinking from midnight. Communicants are expected to abstain from conjugal relations prior to receiving communion. Women during their menstrual period are counseled not to receive communion. Some pious Eastern Christians communicate only four times a year: Easter, Christmas, Dormition of the Virgin, and on their own feast day. They find the practice of weekly or daily communion, as now practiced in the Roman church, fraught with the dangerous possibility of its becoming casual or irreverent.

Intercommunion, that is, offering eucharistic hospitality to Christians who are not Orthodox, is strictly forbidden by the Orthodox and sedulously avoided. Whereas at Vatican II and in subsequent guidelines the Roman Catholic church expressed its willingness to permit Orthodox who approach Catholic priests to receive communion under specific circumstances, the Orthodox did not reciprocate. Orthodoxy requires that a communicant share in the entire range of essential Orthodox beliefs before being eligible for communion. Thus the exceptional decision by the Moscow Patriarchate (December 16, 1969) to allow some measure of intercommunion for Roman Catholics who approach the sacrament was regarded as very unusual. The Orthodox church of Greece, for example, expressed its "surprise, wonderment, and sorrow" at this decision.

Although lay participation in the Divine Liturgy is often regarded as active, even Orthodox observers are now complaining about the isolation and passivity of the laity at liturgies. This is another concern that will be addressed at the forthcoming Great Council.

The Eastern churches do not practice eucharistic devotions outside of the Divine Liturgy. Hence, Catholic devotions such as Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament are unknown.

Sacramental Reconciliation with the Church

The Eastern churches practice private confession of post-baptismal sins to a priest. Such a confession takes place in front of the iconostasis. On a nearby stand have been placed a cross as well as an icon of the Savior or the book of the gospels. After the penitent's confession of sins, the priest places his liturgical stole and his hands upon the penitent's head. Such a laying on of hands is seen as an important sign attesting to the power of the Holy Spirit to forgive sins.

Originally in East and West confession of sin or exhomologesis was a public act consisting of enrollment on a list of sinners and public penance over a lengthy period of time for serious sins. By the 4th century private confession was practiced and even associated with spiritual direction from monks or other holy persons. Sacramental confession or reconciliation in the East is not practiced as frequently as it was in modern Catholicism especially up to the 1960s. The formulas of absolution in the Byzantine euchologia and penitentials use a prayer that is declaratory and avoids the first person, as in the case of baptism. The priest was rarely ever described as judge as in Western theological writings.

Marriage

In the teaching of the East sacramental marriage requires the mutual consent of the believing Christian partners and God's blessing imparted through a priest of the Church. The discipline of the Orthodox church accepts as sacramental only those marriages sanctified through blessing by an Orthodox priest.

The wedding service in the Byzantine tradition consists of two parts. The first part, the betrothal, takes place in the church's vestibule and includes the blessing of rings and their exchange. After a procession into the church this is followed by the crowning, a term sometimes used for the marriage service. The bridal couple then follows the officiating priest in a circular procession to symbolize their spiritual journey to eternity.

Basing their teaching on Ephesians 5, Eastern Christians regard marriage as a mysterion symbolizing the union between Christ and the church. As such there can only be one, eternal bond. Unlike the view of the West which sees marriage also as a legal contract that ceases with the death of one of the partners, for the East the bond perdures. Up to the 10th century no second marriage, not even one performed after widowhood, was ever formally blessed liturgically in Eastern churches. A distinction was drawn between first and second marriages and a special service was introduced for the latter, dissociated from the eucharist and penitential in character. A second marriage was not the norm and hence somewhat deficient sacramentally.

By the principle of "synergy," that is humankind's cooperation with grace, marriage as a sacrament is seen as bestowing of God's grace but requiring human cooperation. The East combines a lofty ideal of indissolubility with realistic legislation that admits exceptions. Eastern teaching interprets the exception clause about divorce in Mt 19:9 regarding porneia to apply to adultery. Adultery is seen as so incompatible with the nature of marriage that Jesus allowed a person to regard a matrimonial bond as non-existent after adultery. The church therefore simply testifies to a cessation when it grants a divorce. The church allows a decree of divorce and remarriage out of mercy in order to avoid greater evil and suffering.

The Roman Catholic church prefers rather to declare if possible an annulment stating that a marriage bond in fact never existed. To the Orthodox this seems a legal fiction contrary to the intuition of those many Christians in this situation who argue that a real marriage did in fact exist but has died. Eastern churches do not have marriage tribunals or ecclesiastical courts as such.

The Orthodox are particularly concerned about the pastoral problems connected with mixed marriages in the diaspora, and how to provide religious education to the children of such marriages.

Laying on of Hands: Sacrament of Order

The sacramental life of the church also includes sharing in the ordained priesthood which is conferred through the laying on of hands by a bishop. Ordination designates one permanently for service of the church's life and continued existence by the Holy Spirit. Priesthood is conferred to assure the continued celebration of the eucharistic liturgy.

The Eastern Orthodox church allows the ordination of married men but does not allow them to remarry even after the death of a spouse once they have been ordained. Since the Synod of Trullo (691-692) only the unmarried are ordained or consecrated to the office of bishop.

The liturgy of ordination to the priesthood contains four parts: the approval of the people asserting the person's worthiness (axios); the invocation or epiclesis of the Holy Spirit, praying for bestowal of grace; the laying on of hands by the bishop; the clothing in liturgical vestments.

Consecration to the episcopate is seen as entry into the fullness of priesthood. A bishop must be consecrated by at least three bishops concelebrating together.

Official Eastern Orthodox teaching corresponds to Roman Catholic teaching in affirming the traditional exclusion of women from ordination to the priesthood based on the selection of men only as apostles by Jesus Christ and on what is seen as the necessity of the priest to serve as an iconic representation of Christ.

Anointing with Oil for Healing

In its teaching on the role of anointing of the sick with holy oil, the Eastern tradition preserves a double tradition, one which associates this anointing with the forgiveness of sins, and a second, drawing upon James 5:14 ff., stressing the healing of the sick. Hence there are really two separate liturgical anointings, one of which is the anointing for the forgiveness of sin even of the healthy at the liturgy of High Thursday, and another which is anointing of the sick. These anointings are both associated with the sacrament of reconciliation.

The practice of anointing the sick which is not frequently administered today in many Orthodox communities, has all the necessary elements of a mysterion: invocation of the Holy Spirit at the blessing of the oil making it a material vehicle for the Spirit's power.

The rite of Christian burial is sometimes listed among the sacramental liturgies belonging to the Eastern church.

The three consensus statements of the Joint International Commission for Theological Dialogue between the Roman Catholic church and the Orthodox church: Munich document (July 6, 1982). "The Mystery of the Church and of the Eucharist in the Light of the Mystery of the Holy Trinity," Text in: Origins 12 (August 12, 1982): 157-160; Bari document (August 1, 1987). "Faith, Sacraments and the Unity of the Church," Text in: Origins 17 (April 14, 1988): 743-749; New Valamo document (June 26, 1988). "The Sacrament of Order in the Sacramental Structure of the Church with Particular Reference to the Importance of Apostolic Succession for the Sanctification and Unity of the People of God," Text in: Origins 18 (October 13, 1988): 297-300. See also: Robert Hotz, Sakramente im Wechselspiel zwischen Ost und West (Zurich: Benziger, 1979). Januarius Izzo, "A Comparison of Some Sacramental Doctrines and Practices of the Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox Churches," Diakonia 10 (1975): 233-243; 11 (1976): 42-51. C. Konstantinidis, and E.C. Suttner, Fragen der Sakramentenpastoral in orthodox-katholisch gemischten Gemeinden (Regensburg: Pustet, 1979). Gennadios Limouris, and N.M. Vapouris, eds. Orthodox Perspectives on Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry (Brookline: Holy Cross, 1985). John Meyendorff, Byzantine Theology (New York: Fordham, 1974). Hans-Joachim Schulz, The Byzantine Liturgy (New York: Pueblo, 1986; original German ed., 1980). Alexander Schmemmann, For the Life of the World: Sacraments and Orthodoxy (New York: St. Vladimir, 1973). Robert Taft, Beyond East and West: Problems in Liturgical Understanding (Washington: Pastoral Press, 1984).

MICHAEL J. FAHEY, S.J.

SACRAMENTS IN THE REFORMATION CHURCHES

The traditional role of the sacraments in the Christian life came under intense scrutiny during the period of theological ferment in the early years of the 16th century. Although the various ecclesial bodies which were born out of this ferment (called collectively the "Reformation churches") have developed their own distinctive ways of interpreting the sacraments, their common theological roots allow us to speak with some accuracy of a Protestant sacramental tradition. The modern descendants of the Reformation churches—Lutherans, Presbyterians, Anabaptists, Anglicans, Methodists, and the Free Churches—continue to debate matters of sacramental practice, but always with an eye to their own specific theological and historical origins.

Origins of a Sacramental Revolution

The early 16th century was a period of intense piety and popular demand for theological understanding in Northern Europe. Vernacular hymnody, preaching services, pious confraternities, and lay devotional manuals and prayerbooks proliferated as Renaissance humanism took hold of the religious imagination. At the same time, however, papal prestige had increasingly eroded since the Babylonian Captivity (1378-1417), and political and financial crises in the Vatican had precipitated the rise in influence of

At the flashpoint of sacramental reformation is Martin Luther (1453-1546), Augustinian monk and professor of scripture at the University of Wittenberg. Luther combined the textbook theology of the day with medieval penitential piety and his own Augustinian insistence on total dependence on a just God into a sacramental system in which divine generosity was a central theme. The sale of indulgences, in which Mass stipends were sold to those who wished to accumulate dispensations of various sorts, flew in the face of Luther's sacramental vision, and precipitated publication of his famous "95 theses" in 1517. Disputations on the dogmatic status of indulgences followed, but at the center was the larger question of the relationship between faith and divine grace in the sacraments.

A fuller explication of Luther's sacramental theology is found in the Babylonian Captivity of the Church (1520), in which transubstantiation, the sacrifice of the Mass, and the denial of the chalice to the laity are condemned. Because of total human dependence on God, the sacraments can never be looked upon as a "good work," and can certainly never be bought and sold as mere commodities. In addition, Luther insists that since explicit institution by Christ is necessary for an authentic sacrament, only baptism and the Lord's Supper qualify.

Within a remarkably short time, Luther's theological ideas spread throughout Germany and were eagerly received by those hungry for reform. Two eucharistic rites, the Formula Missae in Latin (1523) and the vernacular Deutsche Messe (1525-6), translated Luther's sacramental theology into reformed practice, and he insisted that at each Mass the word of God be preached, and that the whole congregation, and not merely the priest alone, partake of the elements. But soon those who had responded to Luther's call for reform began to disagree about the direction in which reformation of the sacraments should proceed.

For many of those who followed, the sacraments were not so much active vehicles of the grace of God (as in Luther's thought), but rather signs that the promises God made in the past continue to be valid and operative in the present. At the Marburg Colloquy (1529), the Swiss reformers Ulrich Zwingli (1484-1531), John Oecolampadius (1482-1531), and Martin Bucer (1491-1551) met face to face with Luther and his compatriot Philipp Melancthon (1497-1560). Their failure to agree on the matter of the carnal presence of Christ in the elements of bread and wine marks the first substantial fracture in the Reformation. Having taken the conservative view, Martin Luther carried his ecclesiastical descendants away from a purely symbolic or memorialistic understanding of the eucharist, while the Zwinglian position resulted in a far more radical sacramental theology among many of the second generation of Reformers.

One of these, John Calvin (1509-1564), who took up the reformation of the church at Geneva, attempted a compromise position between the Lutheran and Zwinglian view of sacramental grace. In his remarkable theological treatise The Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536), Calvin insisted on the absolute authority of God in all matters, including the sacraments. Baptism and the Lord's Supper were viewed as testimonies of the grace of God, with the water of baptism and the eucharistic bread and wine the external sign that we are subjects of that grace, but he was always clear that the presence of Christ in the sacraments was truly, if spiritually, received. Like Luther, Calvin hoped for weekly communion. But since he insisted that the Lord's Supper not be celebrated without communicants, and since most people were used to receiving communion only once a year, he was able to manage only quarterly communion at Geneva.

Although among most of the early Reformers baptism was less the subject of debate than the eucharist, one group sought a more thoroughgoing purification of the church and saw the baptism of mature believers as a crucial element in their reform agenda. Because of their refusal to accept the validity of infant baptism, these so-called "Anabaptists" began rebaptizing those adults who made a profession of faith. Many Anabaptist groups also emphasized pacificism, the restriction of the Lord's Supper to those demonstrating purity of life, and the communal ownership of property, seeking to achieve an undefiled community of faith. As a result, Anabaptists were denounced by Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin, as well as by Roman Catholics, and under severe persecution many believers were martyred.

Despite these major differences, there was agreement among the early Reformers on several points related to sacramental theology and practice. First, the sacraments are activities of the church which are specifically instituted by Jesus in scripture. Second, only two ecclesiastical activities have this kind of scriptural warrant, namely: baptism and the Lord's Supper (e.g., Mt 28:19 and 1 Cor 11:23-26). Third, the human person brings nothing to the sacraments except faith in the promises of God, by which faith alone can one be confident of salvation. Although relative emphasis on these points differed among the ecclesiastical descendants of the early Reformers, all are common to Protestant sacramental theology today.

The Second Generation of Reformers

As the Reformation spread west to the British Isles, its sacramental theology and practice continued to be profoundly influenced by political realities. At the same time, it became more eclectic in character, choosing and combining previously isolated strands of theological thinking. Although Thomas Cranmer (1489-1556) gave a lasting shape to the worship of the reformed church in England in two editions of the Book of Common Prayer (1549 and 1552), his eucharistic theology continues to be the subject of scholarly debate. Both Cranmer's eucharistic and baptismal rites suggest strong Zwinglian and Calvinist influences on his sacramental theology, and his reliance on the work of Martin Bucer also allows a more conservative interpretation. At the same time, changes in the religious affiliation of the reigning monarch further complicated the situation, and sacramental theology came to be a test of loyalty for courtiers and clergy alike. Those with both reformed and Catholic understandings of such matters as the presence of Christ in the eucharist were martyred during the turbulent century between 1550 and 1650.

Cranmer's counterpart in Scotland, John Knox (c. 1505-1572), is less ambiguous in his theological leanings. Persecution of Protestants in Scotland during the reign of the Catholic Queen Mary (1553-1558) forced Knox to Geneva where he came under the direct influence of John Calvin. Upon his return to Scotland, Knox preached Calvin's sacramental doctrine, and framed the services in the Book of Common Order (1556-1564) to reflect these views. As in Switzerland, communion was celebrated four times per year, and each occasion was preceded by a time of penitential reflection so that the unworthy might not participate. Knox, like Calvin, affirmed the presence of Christ in the sacraments, spiritually received by the faithful believer.

The Rise of Puritanism

During the 17th century, those desiring a more thorough reformation of the church began to gain influence, and the sacraments again came under intense scrutiny. Fear of idolatry led to the demand for the abandonment of many rites and ceremonies, including the sign of the cross at baptism, kneeling at communion, and the positioning of the altar so that it more clearly suggested a common table. Scripture was the ultimate authority in all matters regarding the sacraments, and the desire to create a pure commonwealth with congregational autonomy in matters of church government precipitated both an ecclesiastical and constitutional crisis in England. Under the common term Puritanism, these ideas about the sacraments spread with the colonization of the New World and have had profound influence on the shaping of the American religious imagination.

An extreme example of this puritanizing effort is found in the sacramental theology of what came to be called the Society of Friends (Quakers). Under the theological leadership of George Fox (1624-1691), the Quakers believed that reliance on the Inner Light of the living Christ was all-sufficient and available to every individual Christian who waited for it in silence. For this reason, baptism and the Lord's Supper came to be wholly spiritualized, with the physical elements bread, wine, and water abandoned in favor of inward feeding on Christ and cleansing from sin. This is the sacramental reformation at its most radical, and continues today with little change.

The Impact of the Enlightenment

The Enlightenment of the 18th century made a significant impact on the sacramental practice and piety of all of the reformation churches, from Lutherans on the one hand to Puritans on the other. Because of its exaltation of human reason, Enlightenment rationalism put any form of the supernatural under suspicion, and preaching and the informed study of scripture came to be seen as normative

Christian worship. The theology of baptism and the Lord's Supper during this period stressed their impact on the human mind, their usefulness as a method of recalling the virtues of Christ. This emphasis on the memorial aspect of the sacraments led to the further decline of sacramental piety in much of Protestantism, with both the eucharist and baptism forced to the margins of Christian experience.

There is one major exception to this trend toward a rationalist approach to the sacraments. John Wesley (1703-1791), a devout and scholarly Anglican priest, sought a practical religion to serve the increasing masses of the urban poor. His return to patristic sources of Christian practice led him to reevaluate the prevailing apathy in the matter of the sacraments, and also to restore theological elements lost since the Reformation. An ardent and successful preacher, Wesley encouraged weekly celebration of the Lord's Supper, the revival of pneumatology and eschatology in the sacraments, the idea of baptismal regeneration, and the sacrificial aspect of the eucharist. "Classes" and "bands," small groups which met weekly for prayer and examination of conscience, were designed to nurture sacramental piety. Although Wesley hoped that his movement would lead to a revival of sacramental life within the Church of England, a break was inevitable, and Wesleyan Methodism spread independently to all parts of the globe. After his death, however, Methodist interest in the sacraments was never as strong as he had intended it to be.

Romanticism and Revivalism

Protestant sacramental life in the 19th century was shaped by two seemingly opposing forces. The first of these was Romanticism, which had its beginning in Germany at the end of the previous century. In part a reaction to the excesses of Enlightenment rationalism and to the fragmentation of experience resulting from the industrial revolution, Romanticism sought to recapture an idealized past in which work and religion and society were thought to have been a cohesive whole. The Oxford Movement in the Church of England, Mercersburg theology in the American Calvinist churches, the work of Johann Loehe (1808-1872) in Lutheranism each sought in its own way to restore the sacraments to the center of Protestant religious life. In those segments of the church affected by the Romantic movement, eucharistic devotion and frequency of communion increased dramatically (although baptismal theology was less profoundly influenced.) Concomitant with this, however, was a rise in sentimentality and privatization of sacramental piety, with some groups moving close to the idolatry so greatly feared by the 16th-century reformers.

The second major influence on sacramental practice in the 19th century, particularly in American Protestantism, was the rise of frontier revivalism. With a vast land area being settled rapidly, practical measures were necessary to serve the religious needs of an increasingly unchurched populace. Charles Grandison Finney (1792-1875), a Presbyterian lawyer and church leader, began conducting revivals in the mid-1820s after a profound conversion experience during which he received, as he put it, "a mighty baptism of the Holy Ghost." During these open-air gatherings, fiery preaching for conversion, sentimental hymns, and emotional prayer and responses all led to the celebration of the Lord's Supper and the baptism of those who had repented of their sin. This pragmatic use of the sacraments for the making of converts has left its mark on most of the mainline Protestant churches in the United States, and was carried with missionaries as new territory was evangelized.

The Sacraments in 20th-Century Protestantism

The opening of the 20th century saw a new expression of reformed faith and piety which had important consequences for Protestant sacramental life. Pentecostalism, which sees itself as the restoration of authentic apostolic faith, emphasized the necessity of "baptism of the Spirit," as distinct from water baptism. Marked by spontaneous ecstatic utterances, speaking in tongues, and revivalist-style preaching, Pentecostal worship presupposes the constant possibility that God may break into human experience, which separates it decisively from the Enlightenment suspicion of the supernatural. Although most closely associated with such denominations as the Churches of God, Assemblies of God, and Foursquare Gospel churches, charismatic sub-groups have begun to influence mainline Protestants and Roman Catholics as well.

By the middle of the 20th century, the Roman Catholic liturgical movement began to affect the sacramental life of the mainline Reformation churches. Emphasis on the centrality of the eucharist, the recognition of the importance of baptism, the restoration of ancient signs and symbols, and the importance of what the Second Vatican Council referred to as "full, conscious, and active participation" became part of the ordinary theological discourse of many American Protestants during this period. Beginning in the late 1960s, Episcopalians, Methodists, Lutherans and Presbyterians each underwent their own versions of a sacramental revival, resulting in a whole generation of revised rites and texts. Many of the ecclesiastical descendants of the reformers remain untouched by these changes, however, and revivalist, romanticist, and Enlightenment sacramental pieties are still strong among large numbers of Protestant Christians.

In the theologically turbulent 1960s, a great deal of experimentation with the sacraments took place in the Reformation churches, at times taking extreme forms. (The substitution of such things as soda pop and potato chips for the eucharistic elements was not unusual, for example.) This period seems to have passed and although Protestant sacramental theology has reached no widely accepted consensus, there is a growing common interest in the return to early sources and to the Reformation for insight into the nature of baptism and the Lord's Supper. Among many if not most Protestant Christians, however, the sacraments remain on the margins of religious experience, with such elements as exhortation, prayer, and the reading and preaching of scripture continuing to be central.

The future of sacramental piety and practice in the Reformation churches will be shaped by a number of forces at work in the modern world. Since the birth of the World Council of Churches in 1948, concern with ecumenical convergence among separated Christian bodies took on a more formal aspect. Important bilateral dialogues resulted in the 1982 consensus statement entitled Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry, which highlights many points of agreement on sacramental matters. In the years to come, lines of influence among the various Protestant denominations should grow even more complex as ecumenical bonds continue to solidify.

Besides ecumenism, the adaptation of baptismal and eucharistic practice to diverse cultural circumstances should also have major impact on the sacramental future of the Reformation churches. The idealistic missionary zeal of the 19th and early 20th centuries which sought to eradicate local customs and styles of celebration has largely been replaced in recent decades by an acceptance of the variety of religious experiences. The churches in the non-industrial world are growing at an astonishing rate and the balance of power is rapidly shifting away from the West. At some point, quite certainly, American Protestants will have to begin listening carefully to the sacramental experience of Third World Christians, and perhaps adjust their own sacramental practice in response to what they hear.

Finally, the impact of what has been termed the "religious Right," and its communications vehicle "televangelism," cannot be underestimated. With 1 billion television sets in operation throughout the world, evangelical services of worship come into almost every home, subtly shaping the sacramental expectations of large numbers of people. The ultimate impact of the largely neo-Enlightenment and individualist understanding of the sacraments which is presented to viewers has yet to be thoroughly analyzed. It is quite possible, however, that to the extent that this form of televised worship replaces local parish churches, it may tend to work against the recovery of the sacraments as central moments in Protestant worship and piety.

Horton Davies, Worship and Theology in England, 5 vols. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1970). Irmgard Pahl, Coena Domini I (Freiburg: Universitätsverlag, 1983). Max Thurian, ed., Ecumenical Convergence on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, WCC Faith and Order Paper 116 (Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1983). James F. White, Protestant Worship (Louisville: Westminster, 1989).

SUSAN J. WHITE

SACRIFICE

Sacrifice (offering), even if only by way of spiritualization or rejection, figures prominently in most cultures and religions. But its plurality of manifestations and meanings resists general definition. Further, predominantly negative connotations of popular contemporary profane usage, as opposed to the more positive connotations often associated with ancient religious practice, makes unambiguous theological use of the term extremely difficult. Nevertheless, of the five most common suggestions from the history of religions for the primary element of sacrifice (gift, homage, expiation, communion, life), the one most relevant for the Judaeo-Christian tradition is the gift idea. At times, however, the expiation idea obviously dominates.

The OT sacrificial code (Leviticus 1-7; Numbers 28-29) probably represents an idealized post-exilic priestly theology more than a codification of actual practice. Not to be forgotten is that the fierce criticism of both pre- and post-exilic prophets (Isa 1:11-17; Jer 6:20, 7:21-26; Amos 5:21-25; Hos 6:16, 9:4; Mic 6:6-8; Mal 1:10-14, 2:13) does not radically reject but presumes the validity of the sacrificial cult. The most frequent type of OT sacrifice was the holocaust or whole burnt offering (cf. Leviticus 1; Gen 8:20-21, 22:1-14; 1 Kgs 18:20-38), but by NT times, the sin offering (cf. Leviticus 4 and 16) with its attendant theology of atonement had become the dominant type (cf. Heb 9:22; Mt 26:28). One can find in the OT not only the primitive idea of a God-directed human action which assuages or buys off the divinity, but also the more purified idea of atonement, whether positive or negative, as a creature-directed gracious action of God. This development is associated with the process of spiritualization of sacrifice which in Judaism never excluded the material or external, and in Christianity, became a christologization leading to the sacramentalization of Christian life.

For NT Christianity, offering sacrifice was seen as a pagan or Jewish, not a Christian activity. Yet the NT, especially the Pauline and deuterio-Pauline writings, is rich in spiritualized (i.e., christologized) sacrificial language and imagery. Some of these texts speak of or refer to Christ's sacrifice (cf. 1 Cor 5:7; 2 Cor 5:21; Gal 3:13; 2 Cor 5:14-15; Rom 5:6-11; 8:23; Gal 2:20; Eph 5:2; 25; Col 1:24; 1 Tm 2:5-6; Tit 2:13-14; 1 Jn 3:16; Hebrews passim; the eucharist institution narratives). Others speak of Christians as the new temple (1 Cor 3:6-17; 6:15, 19; 2 Cor 6:16; cf. Rom 5:5; 8:9, 11, 15-16; 1 Thess 4:8; 1 Cor 2:10-16; 12:12-31; 2 Cor 1:22; 1 Tm 3:15; 2 Tm 2:20-22; Tit 2:14; Eph 1:22; 2:16, 19-22; 3:6; 4:4, 11-16; 5:23-24; 1 Pet 2:4-10). Still others speak implicitly or directly of the sacrifice of the Christian (cf. Rom 8:36; 2 Cor 4:10-11; Gal 2:20; Phil 2:17, 25 and 4:18 in connection with Rom 12:1; 15:15-16; 1 Pet 2:4-10; Heb 10:19-25 and 12:18-13:16). It is most significant that whenever the NT speaks of or alludes to Christian sacrificial activity, it is never liturgical or cultic but always an ethical activity.

Culminating in the NT, three phases of spiritualization can be seen: (1) the relatively early (beginning with the Yahwist) awareness of the necessity of proper dispositions; (2) the (post-exilic) shift of the dynamic center of sacrifice away from the external ceremony to the dispositions of the worshipper; (3) a "christologization" of sacrifice which sees Christian life and works as the material of sacrifice and identifies the dispositions of the sacrificer with Christ's self-giving love.

This explains the meaning of the two apparently contradictory statements: "Christianity has no sacrifice," and "Christian life is profoundly sacrificial."

Sacrifice and Sacramental Worship

Only from this background can one come to understand the history and theology of the role of sacrifice in Christian sacramental worship. Until the 3rd century, Christians apparently did not offer sacrifice except the radically spiritualized sacrifice of prayer, thanksgiving, and good works (see Heb 3:16, "...such sacrifices are pleasing to God"). The sacrificial references to the eucharist as in Did. 14:1, "That your sacrifice may be pure" are not exceptions; their primary reference is to the eucharistic prayer rather than to a performed ritual.

As the epistle to the Hebrews shows, this highly spiritualized attitude was not easy to maintain. With Hippolytus in the early 3rd century one finds language which suggests that Christians are beginning to look on their bishops not just as leading the spiritualized worship of the eucharistic prayer, but also as presiding over or performing a ritual sacrificial action (Apost. Trad., 4). Presbyters begin to be called "priests"; the eucharistic elements begin to be called "offerings." As the centuries passed, many of the institutional, cultic phenomena associated with OT and even pagan priesthood and sacrifice find their way into Christian practice. For good and for ill, "Christian sacrifice" has remained fraught with the ambiguities of this checkered history.

On the good side, Origen's clear insight into Christ as both the priest and the offering of his perfect sacrifice to the Father, and the universal calling to all the baptized to be, in and with Christ, the priest and offering of their own sacrifice to God (Hom. Lev., 9.9), is taken up by Augustine (City of God, 10.6), and becomes part of the common spiritual heritage of Christianity. But where Origen's connotation is primarily the ethical one of practical Christian life, in Augustine the specifically eucharistic connotation has begun to dominate. We are not far from the aberration, against which the Reformers so vigorously protested, of the priest seeming to have quasi-absolute personal power, even apart from the church, to offer the sacrifice of the Mass as a (in popular misconception) "repetition" of the once-for-all atoning sacrifice of Christ. What was for the Fathers the absolutely central reality that Christ is the principal agent in the eucharistic sacrifice which is not a repetition but a representation (Vergegenwärtigung) of his all-sufficient offering at the Last Supper and on Calvary became increasingly obscured by the horrendous misconception that the priest is the principal agent offering this sacrifice in persona Christi. This misconception wreaks its havoc even to this day, with many priests unable to resist acting out (as if they were Christ) the words of institution instead of properly proclaiming them as an integral part of the eucharistic prayer.

On the popular level, "sacrifice" still suffers under the negative and, at times, deeply aberrational notions which have been associated with it in Judaism and Christianity for three millennia. Despite this, the spiritualization and, with Christianity, the christologization of sacrifice has become a central feature of Christian spirituality and asceticism. In addition, the liturgical and ecumenical developments of the 20th century have allowed the Christian churches with sacramental traditions to achieve a remarkable theological rapprochement in their understanding of the "offering of the church" and of the eucharist as sacrifice. The greatest single contribution to this development seems to have been the historical research and theological reflection stimulated by the "mystery theology" of Odo Casel. Nevertheless, on the popular level, "sacrifice" is still laden with the negative misconceptions which have burdened it in the Jewish-Christian tradition for some three millennia. Until these are purified, what theology has achieved will remain fragile.

For a fuller treatment of the background of the Christian use of sacrifice, see The New Dictionary of Theology (ed. Komonchak, et al. [Glazier, 1987]).

See Eucharist, theology of

ROBERT J. DALY, S.J.

SAINTS, CULT OF THE

The veneration of the saints is related to the cult of the dead. It initially took the

from of praise and imitation of the deceased holy ones (Greek hagioi, Latin sancti), and involved as well, gatherings of celebration and prayer at the place of burial. In its origin, the Christian practice is not unlike the funerary practices among the Romans, the Egyptians and the Hebrews. The major difference is to be found in the Christian attitude toward death, rooted in the resurrection of Jesus Christ (as attested to by funerary inscriptions). In Israel the dead were buried either in the ground or in the floor of a sepulchre. The Egyptians and Romans both practiced inhumation, while the latter admitted cremation as well. The early Christians employed both forms, though they favored inhumation due to their belief in the resurrection of the dead.

In the ancient world, in which Christianity began, tombs were places of contact between humans and the gods. The tomb represented a home for the dead, a place to be visited by survivors. Libations were poured out upon the tomb, and funerary feasts (refrigerium) were celebrated near it, especially on the birthday of the deceased (dies natalis). Among the Jews it was customary to give special honor to the tombs of the patriarchs; among the pagans, to the tombs of dead heroes. In like manner, the early Christians held the tomb to be the privileged place of the saint. And like the Greek hero, the saint was considered to be an intercessor (daemon) who functioned as an intermediary between this world and the next.

Origins and Historical Development

The cult of the saints began in the early church with the commemoration (memoria) of the victims of persecution. The term martyr (Greek martyrion) simply means "witness," but in Christian usage, very early on, it came to mean, more precisely, those who had witnessed to the faith by dying for it. Christ is called the first of the martyrs (Rev 1:5), and this title was extended immediately to Antipas, who died for his faith at Pergamum (Rev 2:13). From the beginning of the 2nd century, references are made to martyrdom as the preferred form of Christian perfection (Ignatius of Antioch). From the middle of the 2nd century until the 4th, the martyr represents the ideal of holiness. At first the interest was limited only to the martyr's death, and by the second half of the 2nd century, documentation in the form of letters gives us authentic and reliable accounts of their deaths.

One of the oldest non-biblical references is found in a letter, the Martyrdom of Polycarp, from the church of Smyrna to the church of Philomelium in Phrygia. Polycarp, the bishop of Smyrna, was brought to the stake, stabbed, and his body burned in the year A.D. 155. According to the account, "We did gather up his bones—more precious to us than jewels, and finer than pure gold—and we laid them to rest in a spot suitable for the purpose. There we shall assemble, as occasion allows, with glad rejoicing, and with the Lord's permission we shall celebrate the birthday of his martyrdom. It will serve both as a commemoration of all who have triumphed before, and as training and preparation for any whose crown may still be to come" (Mart. Poly., 18). Another is a letter from the churches of Vienne and Lyons to the churches of Asia and Phrygia, telling of the persecutions in Lyons (A.D. 177-78). In confessing their faith, the martyrs are one with the risen Christ. A third account is the Passion of Perpetua and Felicity (A.D. 202-03), presenting a first-hand description of their visions in prison. By the mid-2nd century, the term "martyr" designates almost exclusively those who witnessed with their blood.

The cult of martyrs is the beginning of the cult of saints and the veneration given to martyrs is not unlike that given to the dead in general, in that it is localized near the tomb. One great difference, however, is its communitarian dimension by which the believers who celebrate all become brothers and sisters of the martyr in faith. Instead of celebrating the memory of the martyr on the birthday, the early Christians chose to remember the day of death or of rebirth. This gave rise to saints' days and the origin of the calendar for the sanctoral cycle. The first attempts at a sanctoral calendar date to the mid-3rd century, when each local church composed a list of names of martyrs and confessors (those who confessed their faith) including the date of death and the place of burial (see Cyprian, Ed., 12, 2).

Often the eucharist was celebrated at the place of burial. A link was thus established between the eucharist and martyrdom: celebrating the eucharist for those called upon to shed their blood or remembering in the eucharist those who have already undergone martyrdom. In addition, the eucharist served as a support for martyrdom and even a source leading to fulfillment in martyrdom. The eucharistic sacrifice linked to the sacrifice of Calvary gave meaning to the self-sacrifice of the martyr. The death and resurrection of Jesus Christ constituted the paschal mystery which began for each Christian at baptism and was fulfilled and completed in death. By the 3rd century Christians would pray to the martyrs to intercede to God on their behalf. Belief in the resurrection of Christ and its effects on all who fall asleep in Christ prompted the early Christians to ask the saints to intercede for those still living. Some of the most ancient graffiti of the Memoria Apostolorum dating to about 260 attest to this form of intercession. By the end of the 4th century we find expression of this in the commentary on the eucharist of Cyril of Jerusalem: "Then we commemorate also those who have fallen asleep before us, first, patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, that at their prayers and intervention God would receive our petition" (Catech. Mystag., v. 9).

The early Christians focused on the place of burial. By the 4th century in the East, and the 8th century in the West, this veneration expanded to include objects (relics) as well. This shift came about where the transfer of bodily remains to new locations (translatio reliquarium) became necessary. Inevitably, attention shifted from the place of burial to the remains themselves. Between the 4th and 8th centuries in the West, because the translation and dismembering of bodies was contrary to Roman law, the primary focus remained on the place of burial; the only relics of martyrs and confessors that were tolerated were objects that had been in physical proximity to their tombs. In the mid-8th century, however, largely due to the Lombard invasions, many bodies of saints and martyrs had to be moved from the extra-urban catacombs into the city of Rome in order to defend them from the invaders. Urban monuments (churches) were built to house their remains. The veneration of saints took yet another turn.

Some scholars have attributed this shift to include relics among the objects of veneration to "popular" religion, as opposed to an "enlightened" religion (Brown, pp. 16-22). This opposition of "popular" to "enlightened" is, however, a false opposition. Brown goes on to assert that "the cult of the saints involved imaginative changes that seem, at least, congruent to changing patterns of human relations in late-Roman society at large. It designated dead human beings as the recipients of unalloyed reverence, and it linked these dead and invisible figures in no uncertain manner to precise visible places and, in many areas, to precise living representatives. Such congruence hints at no small change. But in order to understand such a change, in all its ramifications, we must set aside the 'two-tiered' model" (ibid., p. 21).

As a complement to this sociological explanation of the change in attitudes toward the bodies of the dead, a religious explanation might be offered as well. The value given to the body through Christ's incarnation and resurrection is equally able, and possibly more apt, to explain how human remains can serve as an object of veneration translated into words and ritual acts (Fontaine, p. 21). In a world dominated by Gnostic overtones which looked with suspicion on anything material, Christian faith proclaims a contrary view. The value of creation as manifested in human form is underscored. The veneration of saints, including the later development of relics, points out the fundamental sacramentality of the human body. A church which gives high value to sacraments would place veneration of the saints, including their bodily remains, in this sacramental context.

From the mid-4th and early 5th centuries, the cult of the saints, began to blossom, e.g., Martin of Tours, Ambrose and Augustine. The early 4th century saw the end of Christian persecution. Consequently a new concept of sanctity, marked by a sense of constant self-martyrdom worthy of venerating, began to develop. As a result, ascetics were also regarded as holy ones capable of mediating people's prayers and intercessions. "Mortify and crucify your body and you too will receive the crown of the martyr" (John Chrysostom, Ep. ad Hebr. Homil II, 3). Reputed for their hidden supernatural powers manifested in miracles, these ascetics were sought out as regional patrons. Upon their death their tombs were honored and their bodies preserved and venerated as much as those of the martyrs. When Hilarion went to celebrate the first anniversary of the death of St. Anthony with his sons, he notes that they tried to hide the tomb of their father out of fear that a rich neighbor might take the body away to his villa where he would erect a shrine to him (St. Jerome, Vita Hilarionis).

Consecrated virginity also came to figure in the cult of the saints as well as the veneration of bishops. Before the end of the 3rd century, virginity consecrated to the Lord was accorded the same honor as martyrdom and considered superior to asceticism. In this same category, widows in service to the church were counted among the saints and their state was likewise considered a form of Christian asceticism. And finally bishops. In the first centuries many of the great bishops were martyrs (e.g., Ignatius of Antioch, Pontian, Fabian, Cornelius and Sixtus of Rome and Polycarp of Smyrna). When bishops began to play a role in the ideal of holiness, other bishops who were not martyrs were included as models of holiness as well.

The Middle Ages saw the rise of great pilgrimages with many devotional practices centered around penitence. Churches built especially to house relics of the saint to whom it was dedicated dotted the pilgrimage routes through Europe and the Holy Land. The dedication of the churches came to be included as another aspect of the veneration of the saints. Frequent visits to shrines often culminated with devotions to the relics. Many of the popular practices (devotio moderna) surrounding the cult of the saints provoked responses from various councils which attempted to clarify the role of the saints and to avoid abuses, e.g., the Council of Avignon in 1209, and Lateran IV in 1215. By the 13th century the Cathari and Waldenses reacted violently to the notion of intercession by the saints. This set the stage for the Reformation.

Beginning in the 16th century, reformers questioned the practice of veneration of the saints. In the Augsburg Confessions of 1530, which were approved by Luther, the role of intercession by the saints was denied in favor of Christ's mediation. The Reformers acknowledged the example of the saints for the Christian life but reacted to the far-fetched legends of the saints which abounded in Christendom.

The Council of Trent in the twenty-fifth session approved of the invocation of the saints with the clarification that "it is good and beneficial suppliantly to invoke them and to have recourse to their prayers, assistance and support in order to obtain favors from God through his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord, who alone is our redeemer and savior" (D.S., 1821). In emphasizing the christological nature of the cult of the saints, this council reaffirmed Catholic doctrine against wrong interpretation. The Council of Trent provided a firm footing for the theology of the veneration and invocation of the saints. This underwent a subsequent development at Vatican II.

The Second Vatican Council in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church summarized the current position of the church on the veneration of the saints: "...from the earliest days of the Christian religion, (the church) has honored with great respect the memory of the dead.... The Church has always believed that the apostles and Christ's martyrs, who gave the supreme witness of faith and charity by the shedding of their blood, are closely united with us in Christ; she has always venerated them, together with the Blessed Virgin Mary and the holy angels, with a special love, and has asked piously for the help of their intercession. Let us teach the faithful, therefore, that the authentic cult of the saints does not consist so much in a multiplicity of external acts, but rather in a more intense practice of our love, whereby, for our own greater good and that of the Church, we seek from the saints 'example in their way of life, fellowship in their communion, and the help of their intercession.' On the other hand, let the faithful be taught that our communion with these in heaven, provided that it is understood in the full light of faith, in no way diminishes the worship of adoration given to God the Father, through Christ, in the Spirit; on the contrary, it greatly enriches it" (L.G., 50-51).

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy proposes that the veneration of the saints be realized in the following manner: "The Church has also included in the annual cycle memorial days of the martyrs and other saints. Raised up to perfection by the manifold grace of God and already in possession of eternal salvation, they sing God's perfect praise in heaven and pray for us. By celebrating their anniversaries the Church proclaims achievement of the paschal mystery in the saints who have suffered and have been glorified with Christ. She proposes them to the faithful as examples who draw all men to the Father through Christ, and through their merits she begs for God's favor" (S.C., 104).

Hagiographical Literature

Several forms of literature worthy of note in the development of the cult of the saints are the Acts of the Martyrs (acta martyrum), Lives of the Saints (vitae sanctorum) and accounts of martyrdom (passiones). Two other written forms which served to anchor the veneration of saints in Christian culture are the libri miraculorum (miracles of martyrs and confessors) and translationes (accounts of transferral of relics).

The Acts of the Martyrs are the most precious documents for hagiography, but they are very few in number. Justin Martyr and Cyprian of Carthage provide some of the few fragments which have survived to our day. The accounts of martyrdom are a much later source that has a lesser historical value. They played a central role in providing the cult of the saints with annual feasts. The genre is a series of stereotyped questions posed by judges with the martyrs' response. Within a liturgical context, the reading of these accounts functioned to actualize the presence of the salvation of God in the assembled body of hearers.

The vitae are the next most notable. Many survive from the late 4th and early 5th centuries and were rewritten during the Carolingian period. They bear a literary style which is legendary. In the East, St. Athanasius composed a life of St. Anthony, which became a prototype for many vitae, and which served as well as an ideal for monastic life. In the West, the accounts of St. Ambrose by Paulinus and St. Augustine by Possidius served as important models of episcopal sanctity, although they contain many legendary embellishments. These vitae were highly dependent upon the life of St. Martin of Tours, composed in 397 by Sulpicius Severus in Gaul, which circulated as a model for Western monasticism. Gregory the Great (d. 604) gathered the miracles of the Fathers of Italy in his Dialogues and Gregory of Tours (d. 594) wrote in great detail of the Gallo-Roman and Merovingian saints in his History of the Franks. Also attributed to Gregory of Tours and of capital importance are the Glory of the Martyrs, Glory of the Confessors, and Lives of the Fathers. In North Africa, Victor of Vita recounts the history of the African persecutions and St. Fulgentius Ferrundus wrote of the life of Fulgentius of Ruspe.

As the term "legend" indicates, these literary pieces were intended to be read for the spiritual edification of the hearer with little regard for historical accuracy. In the 8th century, the vitae were read as part of the nightly office. By the 9th century, they were even more stereotyped. In 10th-century France, this hagiographic activity expanded further through the writings of Hucbald of Saint-Amand, Adso of Montier-en-der, Odo of Cluny and Flodoard of Rheims. These literary sources, although historically dubious, are a valuable source in understanding the various ideals of holiness during this time as well as some of the sacramental and religious practices of the day.

Two other rich hagiographical sources, liturgical in nature, are lists of martyrs (martyrologium) and calendars (calendario). The list of martyrs has a highly local value because it lists the various martyrs attached to a local church. The oldest list is that of the Chronographer of 354, which includes a list of martyrs (depositio martyrum). These lists contain ostensibly three elements: nomen, locus, die (Gregory the Great, Registrum lib. 8, ep. 28) and have an almost juridical value for the transmission of the cult of the martyrs. They indicate the authentic name of the martyr, the place and date of burial or the date and place where the assembly should meet to commemorate the feast, known as the stations. Often the notice of death of a martyr comes from the Passions or other legendary sources. Calendars are a development of the martyrologies and include a wider variety of saints. For example, in the list of the Chronographer of 354 there is a list of bishops (depositio episcoporum).

Modern hagiography began with the work of J. Bolland, S.J. (1595-1665) and the Maurists (J. Mabillon, T. Ruinart) whose task was to sift through all the existing hagiographical material for the revision of the vitae according to a critical method. Since the refounding of the Bollandists in Brussels in 1837, they have been responsible for the development of hagiography through their publications of Acta Sanctorum, Analecta Bollandiana and the Subsidia Hagiographica, for both the Latin and the Greek traditions.

Theology of Cult

Regarding worship (cultus), St. Augustine in the City of God (Civ. 10, 1) spoke about the absolute worship given to God alone (Latin latría). Confusion still remained at the Second Council of Nicaea in 787 (D.S., 601) which dealt with the question of the veneration of icons. This council also made recourse to the term latría, reiterating that it is worship rendered only to God.

Medieval theology, classically distinguished between the supreme worship offered to the Trinity (Greek latreia; Latin adoratio) and veneration of the angels and saints (Greek douleia; Latin veneratio). Due to the religious excellence of the saints, service is rendered to them as beings less than God. Regarding the veneration of Mary, who has a most privileged place among all the servants of God, the term of hyperdulia was coined to indicate her superiority among the saints.

There exists a bond of confident intimacy (communio) between the saints and those on earth which enriches and deepens the relationship with Christ and with God. The theology of the veneration of saints does not attempt to supplant the saving power of God by the saints. Imitation and invocation does not detract from the prerogatives of Christ, but serves to glorify his redemption. By extension of the theology of incarnation and redemption, invocation of the saints implies no essential addition to Christ's mediation but rather a realization of its potentialities and a subordinate cooperation of his members applying the fruits of his redemption (see Aquinas, s. Th. 3a, 25, 6; 26, 1). Through participation in the life of the Godhead, the saints continue to live some degree of divine life and as sharers in this divine life, they beseech God on our behalf.

Belief in the resurrection ensures that all who have died in Christ live on, and that they constitute, with the living, the church as the mystical body of Christ. Thus the living members who have not yet reached the end of their journey invoke the saints as mediators and intercessors through, with and in Christ. The saints therefore are worthy of religious veneration (doulia), as a sign of God's providential action in the church. The church declares them to be the norm and example of a truly Christian life. The theology of veneration of the saints is christologically based, and indicates clearly that the greatness of the saints is derived from and is founded wholly on Christ, who elevates them to share in divine life because of their practice of Christian virtue.

Peter Brown, The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1981). Jacques Fontaine, "Le culte des saints et ses implications sociologiques: réflexions sur un récent essai de Peter Brown," Analecta Bollandiana 100 (1982): 17-41. William M. Thompson, Fire and Light: The Saints and Theology (New York: Paulist Press, 1987). Stephen Wilson, ed., Saints and Their Cult: Studies in Religious Sociology, Folklore and History (Cambridge: University Press, 1983).

MICHAEL S. DRISCOLL

SATISFACTION

In sacramental theology, satisfaction is a term used to describe the good works assigned by the confessor and carried out by the penitent as a way of restoring the order disturbed by sin and as a remedy for sin. It is also called "act of penance" or simply "penance." The sinner accepts the satisfaction during the sacramental celebration of penance after the confession of sin.

In the recent past satisfaction was often reduced to recitation of prayers but the Rite of Penance (6c) directs that it really be a remedy for sin and a help to renewal of life. Thus satisfaction can take the form of good works, service, donation of time or money and fasting, as well as prayers. It should be related to the sins confessed and help restore the good order lost by sin. The personal condition of the penitent should be taken into consideration.

Satisfaction is not a price one pays for the forgiveness obtained since one cannot repay or buy the gratuitous forgiveness of God. Acts of satisfaction are signs of personal commitment that Christians make to God in the sacrament, to begin a new life.

Through the whole history of the celebration of the sacrament of penance, the church has been concerned about the satisfaction element of the rite. In the time of public or canonical penance, and during the tariff penances which date from the Celtic and Anglo-Saxon regions of the 6th century, satisfaction or penance was completed before sins were forgiven. Satisfaction was administered to fit the sin. Suitable penances were listed in penitential books available to confessors for both serious and light sins. Obviously some penances were quite severe, which led to commuting penances and the abuse of paying others to do the penance. By the year 1000 absolution of sin preceded satisfaction in one single rite. This, however, changed the purpose of satisfaction from good works to deal with the sin itself to good works to deal with the effects or punishment due for sin. It became clear to the Scholastics that eternal punishment for sin was forgiven through the sacrament but that satisfaction served as a means of eliminating temporal punishment and was a remedy against sin. This led to an emphasis on indulgence, which is a remission before God of the temporal punishment for sin the guilt of which is already forgiven (C.I.C., 992).

With Trent and in the 1614 ritual, satisfaction was still linked to punishment for sin, but it became increasingly symbolic and for the most part was reduced to prayers. Satisfaction during the course of history changed from severity to mildness. The present Rite of Penance does not speak of satisfaction as related to temporal punishment due to sin but relates it to Christ's work of reparation, requiring works of penance as well as charity toward God and neighbor (25d). It specifically restores the purpose of satisfaction as remedy for sin and the renewal of life.

See Reformation of life

James Dallen, The Reconciling Community, The Rite of Penance (New York: Pueblo Publishing Co., Inc. 1986). Monika Hellwig, Signs of Reconciliation and Conversion (Wilmington: Michael Glazier, Inc., 1984). Bernard Poschmann, Penance and the Anointing of the Sick (New York: Herder and Herder, 1968).

JOSEPH L. CUNNINGHAM

SCRIPTURE IN THE LITURGY

Christian theological enterprise of the last century has been marked by the mutually illuminating study of its sources: the Bible, the liturgy, patristics and church history. Each of these disciplines helps to interpret the others and has had a strong impact on the self-understanding of the churches, their ecumenical commitment and their pastoral practice. Perhaps this is nowhere so evident as in the renaissance of biblical studies among Roman Catholics, the opening up of the scriptures within the reformed liturgical rites and in the consequent interest in biblical studies flowing from the increased use of the Bible in the liturgy. On the other hand, contemporary biblical scholars frequently offer challenging criticisms regarding the church's use of the scriptures within the liturgy.

That the post-Vatican II rites of the Roman Catholic church have been reformed in the light of the church's renewed appreciation of and return to the scriptures is without doubt. S.C. states: that liturgical acts derive their meaning from the scriptures (24); that one of the norms of liturgical revision is to be the increased use of the scriptures (35,1); that Bible services are to be encouraged (35,4); and that pastors are to strive to catechize the people to understand and appreciate the liturgy of the word as an integral element of one act of eucharistic worship (56).

What are presented by the liturgy document as some practical norms of liturgical reform rooted in a renewed awareness of the Scriptures finds its broader theological base in Dei Verbum, The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation. Both of these conciliar documents are grounded in more than a century of biblical, patristic and liturgical scholarship. In the Lectionary for Mass (1969), and more especially in the second edition (1981) of the Introduction to that liturgical book, we discover the pastoral synthesis and fruit of the dialogue between biblical scholars, liturgists and other theologians.

Biblical Formation of the Assembly

The proclamation of the word of God is essential to the liturgical act because the liturgy itself is the church's most profound moment of self-actualization. Because the church is called into being by God's inviting word, that word must be proclaimed day after day. God's call in history is a word calling us now. One might justifiably maintain that "today" or its equivalents (now, this day) is the most critical word in liturgical celebration. Thus the word of God must be enacted in celebration wherein the story of God's enduring love for creation (the mystery) is recounted and experienced again as God's call to us now. Thus we see that a renewed vision of the importance of the scriptures in the liturgy is not primarily a matter of information but more of communal identity and, most importantly, a matter of spirituality. The proclamation of the word of God within the liturgy is constitutive of the church precisely because it is an act calling forth our response in faith. What is proclaimed in words (the readings or lessons) is responded to in chants (the psalms) and prayers which themselves are biblical texts or are directly inspired by them (the eucharistic prayer, other presidential prayers, solemn prayers of blessing). The hearing of the word and the assembly's response are themselves acts of commitment which have moral implications, and these, in their turn, lead us back to worship.

The Lectionary

Because the liturgical proclamation of the scriptures is so formative an element of Christian spirituality, the very fact that a church arranges sections (pericopes) of biblical books to be read in particular liturgical services and how the church goes about shaping that arrangement is of vital importance. Any systematic arrangement of pericopes based upon a liturgical calendar is called a lectionary. The concept goes back to at least the synagogue and may have exerted some influence on the very shaping of the gospels. More specifically, "lectionary" is the generic title applied to the liturgical book which contains these ordered pericopes. More specific titles are applied to liturgical books containing only one class of readings, e.g., the evangeliary or gospel book.

Since at least the Reformation period the pericopes to be proclaimed in the Roman Catholic celebration of the eucharist were contained within the missal which also held all the ordinary and proper texts needed by the priest. For all practical purposes, eucharistic ministry had been reduced to the person of the presiding priest. The postconciliar ordo missae, however, bears witness to a broader restoration of ministries. Among these is that of lector or proclaimer of the word of God. Thus with the 1969 publication of the Lectionary we see not only a remarkable opening of the Bible for all the faithful but also an indication of a renewed sense of ministry centered on the scriptures.

The order of readings in the Roman Lectionary is described in chap. V of the revised introduction. This order is itself the fruit of ecumenical scholarship for it was drawn up in cooperation with experts in exegesis, pastoral studies, catechetics and liturgy (58). These scholars studied, however, not only former arrangements of readings in the Roman liturgical tradition but also in other liturgical families and churches (59). In turn the Roman Lectionary has had a tremendous ecumenical impact in the liturgical revisions of the Anglican Communion, Lutherans, Methodists, Presbyterians and others.

Though the intention of those who arranged the Lectionary was to provide the faithful "with a knowledge of the whole of God's word" (60), not every chapter of every book of the Bible nor every verse within a particular pericope is assigned a place in the Lectionary for Mass or in the other rites. Thus it is clear that the liturgy shapes a liturgical canon of scripture within the broader canon of the Bible itself. The ordering of pericopes employed in the celebration of the church year is itself an interpretive element—even before the act of preaching. Moreover, the assignment of particular pericopes, their use in relationship to others, the chapters and verses chosen or omitted and their employment in conjunction with various liturgical actions or objects is rooted in the hermeneutical stances of the arrangers of the lectionary and the redactors of the liturgical rites. At the local level this holds true for liturgical planners who have a wide range of choices, especially in regard to the chants of the eucharist.

Principles of Arrangement and Selection: Sundays

The introduction to the lectionary gives the general plan and description of the readings to be used in the celebration of the eucharist in addition to presenting the principles employed in drawing up this order (chaps. IV and V). Proper to the celebration of Sundays and solemnities is the provision for three readings. The first of these is almost always from the OT and is chosen because of its "harmony" (66-67) with the gospel pericope. The third reading or gospel, at least in ordinary time, is a semi-continuous reading from Matthew (cycle A), Mark (cycle B) or Luke (cycle C). During the major liturgical seasons the second reading (always taken from a NT letter or Revelation) has also been chosen in harmony with the gospel and the OT text of the first reading. This "harmony" principle of selection is intended to show forth the unity of the OT and NT and to illustrate the centrality of Christ in salvation history.

Some would maintain that the juxtaposition of OT texts chosen to provide a "type" for what will be heard in the gospel sets up a prediction-fulfillment claim which is not true to contemporary understanding of prophecy. Thus the "harmony" suggested could, they maintain, foster anti-Semitism in that it suggests that anyone who knew the Hebrew Scriptures should have been able to recognize Jesus as the Messiah. Defenders of the present lectionary arrangement argue that prediction-fulfillment was at work already in the formation of the OT and certainly in the NT, and that the "harmony" principle therefore respects a process still operative in Judaism (Jensen).

Principles of Arrangement and Selection: Weekdays and Celebrations of the Saints

Weekday celebrations are provided with two readings: the first from the OT or a non-gospel NT reading and the second which is always from one of the four gospels. During the major liturgical seasons both of these are chosen on the basis of themes proper to the season, e.g., baptism and penance during the season of Lent.

In the commemoration of the saints, celebrations of higher rank have three (solemnities), or two (feasts) proper readings. Some memorials also have proper texts assigned but more frequently texts for these celebrations are from the commons of saints or, more preferably, the weekday readings are used so that the priority of the temporal cycle may be maintained, especially during the liturgical seasons.

Chants

Though biblical readings present the most preponderant and obvious use of the Bible in the liturgy, the chants which comprise the full celebration of the eucharist in the Roman rite are normatively biblical texts most often taken from the psalms. These are the entrance antiphon, the responsorial psalm and the communion antiphon. The responsorial psalm is of particular importance as it is an integral part of the liturgy of the word (IL 81,19). It is a unique liturgical moment in that it is at one and the same time an act of proclamation, response and meditation. This is most clearly experienced when the psalm is sung.

The psalm or other biblical text given in the missal as the entrance and/or communion antiphon is most appropriately used when it is sung as the response to the psalm which is assigned for these liturgical actions in the eucharist.

Prayers

The formative influence of the Bible in the composition of the prayers employed in the liturgy may not be immediately evident. Yet in the liturgy the assembly employs texts taken directly from the scriptures, e.g., the Lord's Prayer, and continues to compose others whose logic and shape (the eucharistic prayer and the orations of the Roman rite) are in direct line with that of biblical prayer, especially as seen in prayers of blessing and in the praise psalms. The biblical nature of liturgical prayer may become clearer as the increased opening of the scriptures within the liturgy and the impact of biblical studies exerts a greater influence on homiletics and sacramental catechesis. The ongoing revision of liturgical texts also plays and will continue to play a critical role in this regard. This is already evident in the revision of first editions of vernacular translations of the Roman Missal, e.g., in Italy, Spain and Poland, where new presidential prayers have been composed for each of the three Sunday cycles so that these orations may better prepare the assembly for and resonate with the biblical readings of the day.

The Homily and General Intercessions

In addition to readings, chants and prayers taken directly from the Bible and biblically shaped prayers composed by the church, the reformed liturgy also envisions texts which are prepared by local ministers for each particular celebration. Among these the homily and general intercessions are critical. The homily is normatively based upon the scriptures proclaimed or upon the biblically inspired liturgical texts. The general intercessions are "enlightened by God's word and (are) in a sense responding to it" (IL 81,30).

The Liturgy of the Hours

Though the L.O.H. is more properly considered a celebration of the paschal mystery in and through the symbolism of dawn and dusk, it is in the hours that we see the most exhaustive liturgical use of the psalms in Christian prayer. Biblical readings, OT and NT canticles and prayers are also regularly employed. The use of the psalms in the L.O.H. is governed by the dynamics of two traditions operative in the reform of the present books for the hours: the "cathedral" which tends to choose principally those psalms which seem most appropriate to the praise of God in the morning and the liturgical confession of the assembly's sin in the evening; the "monastic" which is more committed to integral use of the psalter generally in serial arrangement, except for morning and evening prayer where the "cathedral" dynamic is more operative.

It is in the L.O.H.'s use of the psalms that we see the most explicit evidence of the church's christological appropriation of the psalter. By means of antiphons, psalm titles, NT or patristic phrases and psalm collects, the psalms are christocentrically interpreted and celebrated.

The Sacraments

Christian liturgy is ultimately unintelligible without an initiation into the biblical narratives, metaphors and images which generate, shape and interpret the rites and symbols of worship. In the reformed rites of the Roman church no sacramental celebration is without at least a brief proclamation of the word. As in the eucharist, chants, formulae of sacramental ministration and other prayers are direct biblical quotations or texts inspired by the scriptures. The choice of texts for the various celebrations of the sacraments, though often traditional, is sometimes out of harmony with contemporary exegetical understanding of these texts. This is especially the case where texts traditionally employed to prove Christ's institution of various sacraments are, in the present context of biblical, sacramental and ecumenical theology, understood in a different way. This is perhaps seen most clearly in the readings, chants and prayers employed in the celebration of confirmation and ordination to the episcopacy, presbyterate and diaconate.

The R.C.I.A. both presumes a catechetical component which introduces the catechumen to the community's biblical language system and celebrates the word in that setting which is the Christian's most critical place of encounter with the word, the liturgy. This initiatory process has had a tremendous influence on the shape of the lectionary, especially in the Lenten and Easter cycles.

The Word of God in Human Words

The flowering of biblical study and liturgical revival since the last century have borne fruit in reformed rites wherein the tables of word and sacrament are experienced as indissolubly joined and mutually interpretative. It is paradoxical that biblically informed liturgical revision should also give rise to often bitter debate about the role and use of the scriptures in the liturgy. Questions such as the prediction-fulfillment inspired principle of "harmony" in the arrangement of many pericopes, the appropriateness of texts chosen for the celebration of the sacraments, disagreement over where to begin and/or end a pericope or what verses, if any to omit, debate over the benefit or disadvantage of not employing the entire psalm text for the responsorial psalm of the eucharist, the elimination of cursing psalms from the revised L.O.H.—these are but some of the questions raised by rigorous biblical scholarship in a church very much in the process of liturgical renewal.

Perhaps no question has such an immediate contemporary impact on the relation of Bible to liturgy, however, as that of the very language in which the scriptures are proclaimed, sung and prayed. The publication of An Inclusive Language Lectionary (National Council of Churches) and the less radical Lectionary for the Christian People (Pueblo Publishing Co.) bear witness to this.

Not that the contemporary challenge of translations of the scriptures or the translation and composition of liturgical texts is restricted to the question of inclusive language alone. Biblical criticism, for example, has given us a new sensitivity to the genius of Hebrew poetry. This has inspired new psalter translations such as the I.C.E.L. Psalter Project (still in process) which brings together biblical scholars, liturgists, poets and musicians committed to addressing collaboratively the challenges of translation which confront any church desirous of praying the psalms today.

In displaying a willingness to address these challenges the church bears witness to the fact that the church is, in fact, born of the word-in-worship. Yet the church gives shape to the sacramental form of the word both in the biblical text and in its primary form of proclamation, the liturgy. Much of the Bible is rooted in or has taken its final textual shape from an explicitly liturgical context. The assembly's primary and ordinary encounter with the word is in the liturgy, whose celebration presumes a community formed by the biblical story and intelligibly employing its language in proclamation, song and prayer.

See Psalms as liturgical prayer; Word and sacraments, relation between; Word, liturgy of the Jean Daniélou, The Bible and the Liturgy (Notre Dame, IN: Univ. of Notre Dame Press, 1956). General Instruction of the Liturgy of the Hours (Washington, D.C.: N.C.C.B., 1971). Introduction to the Lectionary for Mass (Washington, D.C.: U.S.C.C., 1982). Joseph Jensen, "Prediction-Fulfillment in Bible and Liturgy," CBQ 50 (1988), 646-662. Centre de Pastorale Liturgique, The Liturgy and the Word of God (Collegeville: The Liturgical Press, 1959).

ANDREW D. CIFERNI, O.PRAEM.

SCRUTINIES

Services, held generally during Lent, to prepare adult converts for baptism. Evidence as to how these services were celebrated in the early church is found in the sermons and mystagogical catecheses (Augustine, Ambrose, Cyril of Jerusalem) which explain both the ceremonies and the truths of the faith in detail.

Adults who chose to become Christians were first enrolled as catechumens (learners) or hearers (audientes). At the enrollment ceremony they were signed with the cross, and in the West they were given salt—a valuable medicine and preservative in the ancient world, and thus an apt sign of the spiritual health and stability the catechumen sought from God. Hands were laid on the catechumens in blessing, prayers were said for them, and they were exorcised. After a long period, often lasting three years or more, catechumens could move to the next stage by enrolling as applicants (competentes), chosen ones (electi), or persons to be enlightened (illuminandi). They enrolled by giving in their names near the beginning of Lent, and they would be baptized at Easter the same year. At the time they submitted their names, the applicants were questioned (i.e., "scrutinized") about the moral character of their life. Their sponsors and other acquaintances were also questioned. At a series of ceremonies throughout Lent they were repeatedly exorcised (i.e., they were "scrutinized" for any areas of their life that still needed to be freed of evil influences), read to from the scriptures, and instructed on the meaning of the readings and the basic Christian teachings. At Rome there was a ceremony of opening the ears (apertio aurium) at which they were introduced to the four gospels. Eventually they were taught the creed and (at least in some places) the Lord's Prayer, in a type of ceremony called a traditio (handing over). Before being baptized they had to publicly recite these texts to show they had learned them; this was called redditio (handing back). In southern Italy, Psalm 23 was also handed over to the catechumens. At Milan, this psalm was sung while the newly baptized received their first communion.

The number of scrutinies varied from place to place, but in Rome there were originally three, held on the 3rd, 4th, and 5th Sundays in Lent. The gospels read on these days, from John 4, 9, and 11, recounted the stories of the Samaritan woman who asked Jesus for living water, the blind man healed by bathing in a pool at Jesus' direction, and the resurrection of Lazarus. Psalm 34 was sung with the response: "Come, children, . . ." (34:11). Three scrutinies were still celebrated in the early 6th century, according to a letter from a certain John the Deacon, possibly the man who would become Pope John I (523-6) (Whitaker, 154-8). By the late 7th century, however, the number of scrutinies had expanded to seven, and they had come to be held on Lenten weekdays rather than on Sundays. This is the arrangement of Ordo Romanus XI (Whitaker 196-204). Chants and readings from two of these scrutinies (on Wednesday and Saturday after the 4th Sunday of Lent) survived in the Roman Missal until the reforms following Vatican II. The Gelasian Sacramentary preserves traces of both the Sunday and weekday arrangements (Whitaker, 166-96).

The practice of celebrating scrutinies began to die out with the conversion of the empire, as adult baptism became more rare and infant baptism more usual. The entire series of services, from enrollment to baptism, was collapsed into a single baptismal service, but somewhat differently in each of the Eastern and Western churches. Thus the traditional baptismal service of every rite begins with a selection of ceremonies derived from the old scrutiny services, but the particular selection varies from one rite to another. In the Roman rite, such abridged services already existed in the early 9th century, when one of them was included in the supplement to the Gregorian sacramentary of Hadrian; a similar one formed part of the Roman Ritual down to modern times. After Vatican II, the new Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (1972) authorized a return to the older practice of three scrutinies on Lenten Sundays. The original gospel readings were restored in Year A of the new lectionary.

See Initiation, Christian; Baptism

St. Augustine, The First Catechetical Instruction, trans. by Joseph P. Christopher, Ancient Christian Writers 2 (New York: Paulist Press, 1946). E.C. Whitaker, Documents of the Baptismal Liturgy, 2nd ed. (London: S.P.C.K., 1970). Edward Yarnold, S.J., The Awe-Inspiring Rites of Initiation: Bap- tismal Homilies of the Fourth Century (Middlegreen: St. Paul Publications, 1972). William Telfer, ed., Cyril of Jerusalem and Nemesius of Emesa, The Library of Christian Classics 4 (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1955).

PETER JEFFERY

SEAL OF CONFESSION

On the part of a confessor, or minister of the sacrament of reconciliation, the seal of confession is the absolute requirement of strict confidentiality in regard to information presented by the penitent for forgiveness; on the part of the penitent the seal of confession is the guarantee that such confidentiality will be observed. Under the "seal" the confessor may neither reveal nor use in any way material which the penitent names unless the confessor receives from the penitent explicit permission to do so. The primary reason for such a requirement, in addition to the obvious ones of privacy and protection, is that the material is presented to the confessor as a mediator of God; the material is presented directly to God. It in no way becomes the property of the confessor since the confessor receives it in the name of God.

See Confidentiality; Confession of sins

SECULAR RITUALS

Since ritual activity is an important component of religious faith and practice, the term "secular rituals" may seem inherently contradictory. Yet in a modern, secularized society there are many communal events which can best be understood by making analogies to traditional religious ritual. In this article we shall consider, first, certain formal and psychological congruities between secular and sacred rites and ceremonies. We shall then try to determine where analogy falters and speculate on how civic rituals may help us better understand the nature and function of traditional liturgies.

Formal Correspondence

Persons taking part in religious rituals gather at particular places to enact ceremonies that unfold within a certain time frame. Locations for ritual activity have ranged in complexity and architectural form—from simple outdoor sites or caves to magnificent cathedrals. Some interior spaces have been austere, without ornament or image. In others, walls are lavishly adorned with painting and sculptures. Although they may be diverse in construction and ornamentation, ritual spaces share a common function, to establish a spatial boundary within which liturgy occurs. However complex or simple, liturgical space differs from that of the mundane environment; in a revered setting a pattern of rites or worship takes place. The bounded space is enlivened by ordered actions which have a beginning, middle, and end. These demarcations and rhythms, like those of space, may be simple or ornate, but in all instances ritual time is different from everyday, clock-measured reality.

Secular rituals are associated with a variety of special times and places, but in American culture they are particularly prevalent in politics and sports. In both spheres formalized spaces and carefully ordered events are comparable to those of traditional religion. Civic rituals related to the democratic processes became increasingly elaborate in the later 20th century as television brought pictures of important political events into millions of homes.

The Republican and Democratic conventions, once occasions for the selection of candidates, became increasingly ritualized media extravaganzas to reinforce belief in a previously chosen candidate. To assure the best use of television coverage, political leaders have hired public relations firms to design and oversee an ordered flow of events through four evenings of prime-time TV viewing. Ornamented, balloon-filled convention halls now become "sacred" spaces through which stream carefully orchestrated speeches, representative heroes, mini-dramas, and processions. Finally on the last evening there is a triumphant, happy ending in which all the major players take part.

Every four years these presidential conventions signal the beginning of a series of civic rituals which culminate in the inauguration of the president of the United States. Shortly after the conventions come the debates between candidates—both presidential and vice-presidential. These have been squeezed into a ritualized structure that almost seems to undercut their original purpose. The detailed calculation of time, place, and subject matter has tended to stifle a more open, unpredictable confrontation between candidates. Like traditional mythological heroes and heroines, the debaters now seem programmed to follow certain themes and actions.

Election night brings with it additional hallowed spaces and times. Each network creates a special booth, usually with an illuminated map of the United States as background. In their special locations the major anchorpersons officiate like priests. In constant communication with commentators and observers throughout the nation, they lead viewers through the final moments of the campaign. Immediately following the election, the president elect and his staff begin to prepare for the climactic ritual of politics; the inauguration of the president of the United States. Since for millions there is no possibility to attend this momentous event, the inauguration has become a major telecast ritual. At the time of his inauguration Ronald Reagan advised Americans that the best place to take part in the occasion was in one's living room before the TV screen. There, as the camera lens zooms in on a tight shot of the president, one is "closer" to the action than diplomats, dignitaries, relatives, friends, or even the chief justice who administers the oath of office.

Like politics and religion, sports evoke some of our most passionate beliefs and loyalties. Devoted followers long to be present at the most important sites, for example, the Super Bowl or the World Series. At such times a stadium is transformed into a "holy" place where throngs of devotees are present in the competitive drama of winning first place. Yet in sports as in politics ritualistic circles have widened across national and cultural boundaries to encompass millions. Throughout the world faithful fans, through the mandala of the TV tube, enter vicariously the sacred time and space of the Super Bowl, World Series, or the Olympics.

Secular rituals, like traditional religious rituals, have primary and secondary actors or participants. Politicians, sports heroes, and anchorpersons, like a clerical hierarchy, are the major players. At the same time, ardent supporters in the stadium or on the convention floor—or even those watching in their living rooms or the local pub—play parts unlike their roles in ordinary life. Cheerleaders and band members who wear special costumes and occupy select spaces like church choirs lead the crowd in litanies and victory songs. Even the ordinary participant may dress up especially for this liturgical event. Secular rituals have become an opportunity for people to transform themselves into fantastic creatures. Sports fans dress in the team's colors and many wear T-shirts or sweaters with the team's symbol or logo. Some with masks impersonate the team's mascot.

Political conventions also liberate ordinary people and encourage them to wear appropriate ritual costumes. Now that television coverage includes camera sweeps and close-up details of those on the convention floor, many people come especially prepared for the pageantry. At the Republican and Democratic conventions loyal followers adorn themselves with hats and masks—mostly variations on the themes of elephants and donkeys. Any kind of dress is acceptable so long as it carries a message or slogan. Hand-held banners—of any color, but generally red, white, and blue—are commonplace, and people carry noisemakers and horns that blast forth their approval of leaders. Garbed in such ritualistic attire, enthusiastic delegates readily rush out into aisles for parades and demonstrations of support for their candidates.

Ancient and medieval pilgrims to holy places liked to bring home trinkets and charms—symbols of gods, goddesses, saints, or other reminders of their experience. Similarly, today's faithful who take part in civic rituals may bring back souvenirs. Those fortunate enough to get to conventions or playoffs have a choice among many different kinds of mementos: pennants, miniature and plastic footballs and baseballs, pictures of heroes, audio-visual tapes of the event to replay later. Viewers at home who feel left out may order memorabilia in advance to share with friends and neighbors as they watch the telecast event.

Thus far the analogies between secular and religious rituals have been based on similarities of form—closed, extraordinary space, bounded segments of time, and the dramatic action and interaction of primary and secondary participants. Yet traditional liturgies are not valued primarily for their formal qualities, and undue emphasis upon them does not do justice to their substance and function in human experience. Proponents of secular rituals, too, would insist that there are other corresponding features which are life-enhancing and fulfill certain basic human needs.

Psychological Affinities

The sacred time and space of traditional religious ritual are communal; participants, however, may experience a wide range of emotions. Even though changes in human hearts and minds are ultimately unknowable, theologians, anthropologists, psychologists, and poets have written about the states of mind that accompany ritual action. Such discussions are speculative and cannot penetrate the mystery of a single, private moment; still, one can investigate some of the basic dynamics of religious rituals and then ask whether similar emotions are experienced in secular rituals.

It is commonly observed that religious ritual provides an opportunity to step outside the flux of time and space. In the ritually constructed closure one can escape the ceaseless linear motion of every day life and enter a different realm of being—a divine enclave which humans occupy only briefly before they return to daily life.

Religious liturgy enables one through withdrawal to experience a radically different orientation to reality. At such time a faithful participant may live in a state of self-forgetfulness, released from the boundaries of individual consciousness. Here in effect, one may momentarily counter the suffering and uncertainty that are part of life. This is the essentially saving dimension of religion which enables women and men to rise above the pain and futility, and sense of impermanence of life. During these moments a person "understands" things that are beyond understanding. Such self-transcendence, accompanied by feelings of awe, wonder, and humility, transforms the outlook of believers. It enables them to return to the tedium of existence with reassurance and hope and to live a fresh vision in an old world.

Anthropologists, such as Victor Turner, have commented on the transformative dimension of ritual. The spectrum of transformations is vast, and individual members of religious groups may be touched by ritual in different, unpredictable ways. The common denominator is a feeling of belonging, of being a part of a larger whole. In liturgy repeated rhythms, gestures, sounds, and shared sacraments nurture a sense of community. Even in informal rites of worship, members of congregations join in responsive readings, reciting the creed and singing hymns. Common worship creates among persons of different social or political views at least a tacit sense of accord and a shared vocabulary of faith.

Turner and others have suggested that in a complex, secular society the power and dynamics of traditional religious ritual have migrated into other domains such as politics, aesthetics, sports, and popular culture. Indeed artists—musicians, dancers, painters—and athletes have experienced a self-transcendence at the height of a performance. Persons who attend rock concerts feel the sense of community there and the revivification of emotions associated with the events. Do these secular activities contain residual elements of religious ritual? Or do religious and secular rituals derive their transformative and integrative power from a common source?

For scholars such as Johan Huizinga and Hugo Rahner, the concept of homo ludens becomes a symbolic bridge between secular and religious rituals. The human drive to play is the primeval source from which issue both secular and sacred games of life. The game—characterized by particular rules, space, and time—is the prime metaphor that allows us to understand better the regenerative escape from life and the loyalties evoked by the serious ritual play. Thus to Rahner, for example, liturgy is a reflection or counterplay that celebrates the cosmic game of grace. Yet even without such a theological vision of redemption, the dynamics of serious play may generate transforming and community-creating energies.

Persons who reject traditional religious beliefs and church affiliation may find emotional reassurance and a sense of community in the ritualistic dimensions of secular culture. There they can be enthusiastically caught up in the serious play of the arts, sports, or politics where particular rules give a sense of order and where closures of time and space offer opportunities for self-transcendence.

The close relationship between professional football and television in American society has created ritualistic sanctuaries every Monday evening. In their armchairs before TV, millions of viewers find a momentary way out of unresolved, day-to-day confusion. For over an hour every week there is an opportunity to get outside of reality and to lose oneself enthusiastically in the dramatic action of game time. Here one can "live" for a while in a world that has rules and order. And, like the liturgical calendar, the football season develops in complexity and the drama intensifies, coming to a climax in the Great Liturgy, the Super Bowl.

The fans before TV sets and those in the stadium experience a sense of community. One can converse with strangers at the ballpark or discuss the playoffs with the check-out clerk at the local grocery. Persons who understand little and care less about catholicity in religion, nevertheless appreciate and live within an extensive belief system of loyal supporters of say, the Boston Celtics, Washington Redskins, or New York Mets. Bolstering that sense of community is the mythology of sports. TV commentators and newspapers fill believers in on the games they missed, as well as major events in the lives of the players. Fans are conscious of records and heroes who may eventually be tapped for the Hall of Fame. Legends comparable to those of religious heroes and heroines help to nurture the sense of belonging to a community, one that reaches back into time and looks ahead to the future.

Because play is believed to be central to human culture, it is not accidental that political activity is described with words like "race" or "runoff." Moreover, TV coverage has accelerated its game-like characteristics. While there is probably more cynicism about politicians than sports heroes, campaign managers confident in the democratic processes and its players use political rituals to reinforce and legitimate belief. Persons who attend the political conventions, as well as those who view them on TV, are expected to be transformed, to experience a loyalty and reassurance that will prepare them for the campaigns to be fought later in the everyday world.

In the late 20th century special events in American society became ritual opportunities for all Americans regardless of political affiliation. On July 4, 1976, ceremonies and happenings throughout the nation were orchestrated by networks and telecast during the entire day. Anchorpersons wove together a continuous fabric of sights and sounds from various cultural spheres—high and popular arts, sports, and politics—designed to reinforce a sense of community and confidence in the American way. Similarly on July 4, 1986, when Ronald Reagan officiated in the relighting of the torch of the Statue of Liberty, it was a rite of renewal of faith in an open, democratic society peopled by immigrants from throughout the world. On less joyous occasions television has enabled the nation to join in rituals of mourning. Americans first experienced an encompassing nationwide lamentation when millions "shared" their grief during the telecast funeral of John F. Kennedy. Years later, President Reagan became priest and pastor, leader and comforter of the nation during the telecast memorial service for the Challenger astronauts.

We may recognize that secular rituals inspire a sense of community and even evoke moments of self-forgetfulness; still, there are lingering questions. Are concepts of transcendence and belonging that are attributed to religious and secular rituals really comparable? Are there limits to formal and psychological correspondences?

Theological Distinctions

To demonstrate distinct, ineluctable differences between religious and secular ritual one must center on the symbolic content of the action or event, rather than on its formal or psychological dimensions. In addition, the distinctions need to be reinforced by a definition of religion which presupposes a metaphysical reality that is not humanly constructed, one that is the ultimate source of meaning and being. Differences in symbolism become clear when we use these theological presuppositions to speak about the nature of transcendence associated with religious ritual. In the course of liturgy faithful participants counter the suffering and death experienced in life, anticipating a "something more." Although theologians and ritual participants may disagree about the nature of this saving realm of being, they share the conviction that there is an unknowable "Other" which is the object of human desire and which may be "known" tentatively, obliquely and momentarily in ritual experience. The physical gestures, prayers, biblical readings, and sacraments of the eucharist, for example, draw us (in Rahner's terms) into the playing of God, the everlasting game. Thus ritual time, space, and action encompass a very special, incomparable game because its rules, measures, and Chief Player are beyond human imagination and creation.

The sense of belonging inspired by many secular rituals seems parochial in contrast to the cosmic sense of salvation present in many world religions. Moreover, in Christian theology, the doctrine of the Holy Spirit assures believers of an a bidding presence in all aspects of individual and corporate life. In addition, for many religious groups the consciousness of community brings with it not only an identification with others but also certain ethical obligations to them. The eucharist, for example, ends with an admonition to go in peace and serve with gladness and singleness of heart.

Theological distinctions held by faithful communicants do not preclude participation in civic or secular ritual. They do, however, point to the uniqueness of religious ritual as an encounter with grace, an attunement to Being beyond the humanly constructed games of art, politics, and sports. Yet we must wonder why our secular play seems to have more vitality than that of religion. Is it because the values and dogmas of our civic belief system consume our creative energies? Or have the symbols of religious groups become so identified with those of the secular, materialist society that the theological distinctions which set them apart become obscured? Have traditional religious symbols become so encrusted and inadequate for our time, that persons looking for serious play and a cosmic view go elsewhere?

Religious ritualists may learn from secular liturgists. From sports, politics, and even commercials, they can learn how important the arts—dance, music, drama, images—are to human communication. In the playoff—in the stadium or before TV—they may observe how passion and loyalty enliven ritual. Environmentalists and peace groups may challenge them to give new meanings to old symbols and to enlarge their vision of community. Secular rituals dramatize the human need for serious play that transforms the ordinariness of life. The vitality of these humanly constructed worlds, their symbolism and celebrations challenge the church to re-examine and revitalize its sacramental forms.

Gregor T. Goethals, The TV Ritual: Worship at the Video Altar (Boston: Beacon Press, 1981). Johan Huizinga, Homo Ludens: A Study of the Play Element in Culture (Boston: Beacon Press, 1962). Hugo Rahner, Man at Play (New York: Herder and Herder, 1972). Victor Turner, "Variations on a Theme of Liminality," Secular Ritual, eds. Sally F. Moore and Barbara G. Myerhoff (Assen/Amsterdam: Van Gorcum and Company, 1977).

GREGOR T. GOETHALS

SECULARIZATION AND WORSHIP

An understanding of the phenomenon of secularization is important because it is a major underlying sociocultural, and to a great extent, religio-theological process which influences worship for the modern person. We will discuss the relationship between secularization and worship under the following topics: 1) the cultural and theological context; 2) its challenge to worship; 3) NT perspective; 4) persons, times and places; and, 5) towards a new integration.

The Cultural and Theological Context

The meaning and implications of the historical process of secularization are ambiguous, complex and sometimes contradictory. The concept has been used not only by ancient philosophers, like Anaxagoras, Xenophanes and Socrates in their critique of the popular gods and myths, but also by modern theologians, especially Protestants, like K. Barth, D. Bonhoeffer, and the "death-of-God" theologians in the United States. Although departing from different perspectives in their interpretation of a "religionless Christianity," the common denominator of the theologians has been in general a positive view of the phenomenon of secularization in a world which has come "of age." From the perspective of the science of religions, secularization is interpreted within the theoretical parameters of the dialectic presence of the two opposing poles of the sacred and the profane, and the religious and the secular. The sacred means something separated, different and extraordinary, a mysterious, transnatural and impersonal power. At the other extreme, the experience of the profane in secularist ideology is an horizontal conception which underlies "secular religion" and proclaims the autonomy of universal human values. In political terms, secularism denies the social and public value of religion because it is seen as substituting the irrational for the rational. Social sciences, especially the sociology of religion, offer a major contribution to the modern debate concerning secularization. They emphasize the ambiguity of its terminology, which is more ideological than scientific. Examples of this critique against reductionist and mystifying terminology especially in the 1960s, are T. Rendtorff in Germany and D. Martin in England.

Etymologically speaking, "secularization," which comes from the Latin saecularis, means "becoming worldly." It refers to a social, cultural and political process of emancipation of organized society from the hegemony of religious institutions and symbols. While secularization, an ambivalent term, does not imply per se the diminution of religious symbolism and the experience of faith, it has contributed to the decreasing influence of institutional religion in the modern world. Historically, secularization has meant the usurpation of church property by the state, especially in the transfer of educational religious institutions. This new shift in the relationship between church and state which began after the Reformation in England, became a widespread phenomenon during the 19th-century liberal movement in Europe.

The above approaches speak of the many meanings of the complex phenomenon of secularization and the possible ideological ambiguities in our modern world. It is a world in transition. There is no doubt that a paradigmatic shift from a sacred conception of nature and society to a secular vision of the universe and humankind took place in Western culture. This shift undoubtedly brought about the crisis of the traditional role of religion in a post-agrarian, technological and science-based society. Approaching the third millennium, Christianity lives in a critical age of cultural crisis and unresolved tensions. It can approach the crisis of secularization in a more positive fashion, and in that very crisis find an opportunity to renew itself.

In general, secularization is not only a pervasive reality, it is also—in its extreme version—the myth of modernity, especially the latter. The end of religion and ritual did not take place as predicted in the 1960s by secularism. The same anthropocentric and rationalistic cultural presuppositions on which those predictions were based are now changing. Today there is not only a renewed vitality within religion but also a real interest in the restoration of sacramental and symbolic religiosity. The new constellation of ideas presents the opportunity for an integration of the vision of the true secular and the authentic religious spheres, the cosmos and the person, God and humankind.

The challenge presented by secularization to worship, which is the cradle of religion, calls for a wider approach from the theological perspective. Much seminal research was done by K. Barth, P. Tillich and D. Bonhoeffer, among others. In their attempt to understand positively the process of secularization in the light of biblical revelation, a more realistic approach in Christian thinking was made possible. The defensive Catholic ecclesiology could not come to terms with a positive evaluation of the values of secularization until the Vatican II period. At any rate, both theologies of secularization followed different perspectives: the Protestant, which departed from the theology of justification, and the Catholic, which in valuing the secular order and its consecration in Christ, viewed a theological criterion in the incarnation in Christ who assumed the human condition. Vatican II's Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (cf. especially G.S., 36), represented a realistic evaluation of the phenomenon of secularism as one of the signs of modern times to be interpreted critically in the light of the gospel. Three major points of progress were made: the value of human activity in the rebuilding of the secular order, the unity of the secular and the religious realities in the mystery of Christ; and the dignity of the universal values of the human person (moral conscience, freedom) within the rightful autonomy of the modern world and within the design of God.

Its Challenge to Worship

Overcoming a false dichotomy of two spheres in the world, this critical but optimistic evaluation of secularity paved the way for a new integration of the secular and religious, the sacred and the profane. This integration leads to two important questions: is the person of the scientific-technological civilization, because of that very civilization, capable of the liturgical act? Is our worship realistic, or is there a profound gap between faith and culture? The first question has been asked since the beginning of the liturgical movement. There is no doubt that "behind the crisis of worship there is a general crisis of faith" (Upsala, 1968). Nevertheless, despite the fact that modern, non-religious culture is divorced from a vision of faith, the individual person is still in need of providing an adequate answer to existential questions and especially to the ultimate meaning of his/her existence. The change from a sacral to a secular consciousness made those questions even more acute and can be answered only with a critical acceptance of the values of present culture lived and celebrated in the transcendence of the mystery of the incarnation. Conquently, the meaning and role of religion has changed, and so has the perceived meaning and the actual role of worship. A "free world" points to a worship freed of alienating, ultra-sacralizing elements; that is, worship is to be a liberating and salvific experience of faith, not separated from daily life, but at the heart of it.

In fact, if there is a liturgical crisis, it is not only because a change of cultural presuppositions took place, but also because the correspondence between the meaning of worship and the living reality of the Christian as a "being in the world" is missing. A clear example of this gap is seen in Roman eucharology, in the absence of a theology of creation, and of temporal realities, and an emphasis, instead, on an idiom which corresponds to an archaic social order. The significance of a ritual for the modern person's spiritual needs is mediated by a concrete cultural climate because culture is never accidental in people's lives, but serves as an essential condition for human realization. On one hand, worship must always be an uncompromised prophetic sign of the biblical-evangelical message to an anthropocentric and materialistic culture. Yet, on the other hand, worship cannot remain aloof or isolated from the secular universe of values and ideas, struggles and hopes of the secular order. Corporate worship is the real matrix of social configuration through which a culture is endowed with Christian meaning. The integration of the positive values of secularity and the religious experience is crucial. Symbolic ritual actions and language that are in contact with the social life, and thus capable of transfiguring it become meaningful when they inspire a personal response and illustrate present conditions.

Both dialectic bipolarities of the secular and religious, sacred and profane have an intrinsic relationship with worship. Worship is a person's response to the transcendent and the divine. How do we conceive this transcendent and divine presence in the nature of worship? How can we have a secular liturgy which celebrates the transcendent sacredness of God? The answer to the above bipolarities and to these questions should stem from an authentic interpretation of a biblical theology of worship.

NT Perspective

Christian worship is the actualization of the priestly ministry of Christ through the signs of the ecclesial community. Realizing a spiritual and prophetic sacrifice, Christ restored the whole of creation and life and, thus, opened up all dimensions of the created world to the effects of God's redemptive mystery (cf. Col 1:20). Christ became the priest, the temple and the altar, radically transforming all created things. This christological impact of the Easter victory altered the vision of the sacred, nullifying its false separation from the profane. The whole of life came to be sacred, experienced in the presence of the transcendent reality. Christ became present in the heart of the human and secular realities celebrated in worship. Consequently, there is nothing sacred or profane in itself, but only that which is made holy by reason of divine grace present whenever human life is lived and celebrated in faith. This pervasiveness of the sacred was already prepared in the OT and especially in prophetic revelation. God is seen not only as the Creator of all, whose image marks every person, but also the Lord of a cult of obedience and service to the totality of life (Hos 6:6). The NT accomplished this covenantal idea of worship with a passion for existential meaning in the divine initiative and commitment. This meant the rejection of cultism as the denial of God's design, and the realization of a worship "in spirit and in truth," as an offering of the totality of the person and his/her life (1 Cor 16:15; 1 Pet 2:5). The christological event constituted the end of the dualistic opposition between the sacred and the secular, and consequently the beginning of an eschatological worship centered in Christ.

This concept of worship is fundamentally linked to a pneumatic reality. Christ is the fullness of this pneumatic reality which breaks the boundaries of any created cult and abolishes any magico-sacral attitude toward worship. The rebirth of a Christian in that pneumatic reality through baptism allows the possibility of true liberating worship: "The world, life and death, the present and the future, are all your servants; but you belong to Christ and Christ belongs to God" (1 Cor 3:22-23).

The radicalizing Christian attitude of worship does not abolish the sacramental expressions rooted existentially in the core of life. On the contrary, it acknowledges the deeper and wider sacramental dimension of human life. Sacramental and liturgical celebrations spring from key human experiences which are transformed by God's sanctifying presence. Those celebrations draw their power from the paschal mystery which consecrated the authentically human. Thus, the sacramental significance subsumes the created and natural significance. From this line of thought we can conclude that Christianity accomplished a shift from the cosmos to the person, to a person conceived as an embodied spirit and as a unified being. A person is not just part of nature, but the center of it. This biblical anthropocentric shift meant a secularization of the naturalistic views of cosmic religions, and furthermore a purification of any utilitarian or ambiguous sacralization in regard to the meaning of persons, times, and places in liturgical context.

Persons, Times and Places

Since the whole of life is holy, the total person is holy. In NT terms, Christian identity goes beyond the creative order. It shares the corporate priestly identity of a consecrated community (cf. 1 Pet 2:9). As a chosen and priestly people, this community's worship is a worship of the whole of life, not different from it, and it cannot be understood as an extension of a cultic priesthood of a sacral office. Priest and priesthood are applied only to Christ and his redemptive work; from him the universal priesthood of the people of God derives. This concept was not applied to the office-holders in the church until the 3rd century. From then on an artificial distinction between clergy and laity prevailed until the new theology of Vatican II. The council presented the whole community as the integral subject of the liturgical celebration (see, especially, L.G., 10, 11).

In the eschatological event of Christ, secular time is a special opportunity of grace because of the abiding presence of God (kairos). It goes beyond the sacrality of the succession of ordinary time (kronos) in the natural cycle of life and death celebrated by the cosmic religions. Christianity is an historical religion which conceives time as the arena in which God's action of creative and liberating fidelity is revealed.

From this perspective the totality of time has a focus "in the word who came to dwell among us," and moves toward a divine goal from the center of Christ, the beginning and end of secular time. The Lord's day is an instrument and a means, not an end in itself, because the whole life of a Christian, not a particular day or feast, is new time and an opportunity for receiving the salvific gift from the paschal event. As Paul says to the Colossians, "Never let anyone else decide what you should eat or drink, or whether you are to observe annual festivals, new moons or sabbaths. These were only pale reflections of what was coming: the reality of Christ" (Col 2:16-17).

Sacred places do not exist in the economy of the spiritual worship of the fulfilled Kingdom of God. Here we can distinguish on one hand a primary theology of the body of Christ as a reality of the presence of God, and the body of the church, a sign of the presence of Christ. On the other hand, we should value the theological reality of the place of worship in which the joyous manifestation of the church-assembly takes place and allows the gathering of thanksgiving, the action of the mystery, an atmosphere of contemplation, a sense of transcendence and a milieu of prayer.

The early Christian writers vigorously affirmed that they did not have temples or altars. In fact, from the very beginning, Christians celebrated their eucharist in a family-like setting in the home. Even when their numbers and social standing required a larger and more public place during the Constantinian historical shift, they rejected the religious temples and chose the secular basilica of civic and social life. The patristic theology of the presence of God rejected the idea of emphasizing the materiality of the temple and its mode of worship to comprehend the temple of the new humanity through the incarnate epiphany of Christ. By his incarnation Jesus became the final priest of the new temple of his body (cf. Jn 2:19, 21), and the living stone on which the living stones of the people of God make their spiritual temple (cf. 1 Pet 2:5; Heb 8:1). Consequently, this primary theology of the domus ecclesiae should not only prevail but be served by the secondary and functional theology of the domus Dei. Transferring the vision of holiness from the assembly to a sacral place has negative effects on the orthopraxis of the ministerial community. A living temple is the only metaphor of a worship anchored in the heart of daily living, not apart from it. That living temple becomes the only meaningful sign-symbol of the worship of God's presence in the world.

Towards a New Integration

The movement of secularization, not only of the false sacred in persons, times and places, but also in objects, language and rites calls for a critical balance which demands a relative sacralization of the totality of the liturgical action. If secularism denies the relation to the divine, the access to its transcendent mystery, or simply the reverent acceptance and awe of its salvific presence, the oversacralization overburdens liturgy with mysterious ritualism, magical and supernaturalistic attitudes. Secularism, as the denial of the transcendent sense, could reduce the celebration of the mystery of God in us through Christ to a partial psychological or pedagogical exercise. Christian worship can only happen through the binomial sacrament-word in which the corporeal and the cosmic are symbolically related to the transcendent and the spiritual. Furthermore, the theocentric and christological character of liturgy demands a sacredness of the sacramental mediation in the encounter of the divine irradiation of grace with the human need for transformation. However, this mediation does not happen automatically, but depends on the quality of the faith community, and on the relevance of the symbol and the prophetic word. Vatican II states that "every liturgical celebration is a sacred action" (S.C., 7), precisely because it is the action of the paschal mystery of Christ and of his body, the church. The post-Vatican II reform purified liturgy of the historical accumulations of the late medieval over-sacralization and called for a renewed sense of the sacred (cf. Synod of 1985; Apostolic Letter of John Paul II, 1989).

In reviewing the phenomenon of secularization and the action of worship, one must try to clarify the complexity of the issue and its implications for a Christian community which is immersed in present history and fully actualized in the liturgy of the incarnation. Secularization has been a challenge to, not the end of worship, especially in the presently developing climate of a post-enlightenment culture which is more sensitive to sacramental and transcendent reality. A shift from the sacred to the inclusive secular understanding of persons has made possible a new synthesis between the mystery of worship and the person of present-day urban-scientific culture. Different theological trends (secular, political, liberationist) which followed the affirmation of Vatican II of modern humanistic values, allowed different interpretations of the function and meaning of worship. The never-ending process of the cult and culture interchange calls today for a renewed liturgical movement in which other liturgical dimensions (popular-religious, contemplative, festive, ministerial) could bring the dialectic between secularization and worship to a higher level of an integral and transcendent vision of the person in the unity of the mystery of Christ.

See Liturgy in a technological age

Langdon Gilkey, Society and the Sacred (Crossroad: New York, 1981). Luis Maldonado, Secularización de la Liturgia (Madrid: Ediciones Marova, 1970). Raimundo Panikkar, Worship and Secular Man (New York: Orbis Books, 1973).

GERMAN MARTINEZ

SICK, ANOINTING OF, FREQUENCY OF

Until the recent reforms of the Second Vatican Council, the repetition of the sacrament of the anointing of the sick was a rare occurrence. This was the consequence of developments concerning this sacrament during the Middle Ages. At that time anointing came to replace viaticum as the last sacrament of the Christian. As such, anointing became associated with the practice of deathbed penance and came to have attached to it the same sense of unrepeatability that once-in-a-lifetime penance had. And although the Council of Trent maintained in its teaching the larger tradition that anointing was for the sick, including ("especially") the dying, the medieval understanding and practice concerning the sacrament continued to dominate pastoral practice in the Latin church until Vatican II. Anointing continued to be delayed until the point of death with the understanding that in this way the dying Christian was ushered into eternal life having been forgiven any remaining vestiges of sin. Under these circumstances, the possibility of a later repetition of the sacrament (for which some provision had been made by Trent and, later, the 1917 Code of Canon Law) was rarely even a question.

The reforms of Vatican II replaced anointing with viaticum as the sacrament proper to the dying Christian. Anointing was recovered as the sacrament which the church associates particularly with the sick, some of whom may be preparing for death. The criterion for deciding the proper time for anointing is now "serious illness" rather than "danger of death"—"Great care and concern should be taken to see that those of the faithful whose health is seriously impaired by sickness or old age receive the sacrament" (Pastoral Care of the Sick, 8). In catechesis the community should come to understand that the sacrament of anointing is to be requested at the right time, that is, the beginning of serious illness. This will help to avoid "the wrongful practice of delaying the reception of the sacrament" (P.C., 13). Thus, the celebration can take place "while the sick person is capable of active participation" (P.C., 99).

Under these conditions, the possibility of repeating the anointing of the sick can arise. This is addressed directly. "The sacrament of anointing may be repeated: (a) when the sick person recovers after being anointed and, at a later time, becomes sick again; (b) when during the same illness the condition of the sick person becomes more serious" (P.C., 102). In the first instance, that is, serious illness followed by recovery and subsequent illness, it is presumed that the subsequent illness is also "serious." The second condition makes it possible for the sacrament to be celebrated again when the progress of an illness presents the sick person with a deeper and further challenge to perseverance and belief. The sacrament may also be celebrated again, if warranted, in the case of those who are "chronically ill or elderly and in a weakened condition" (P.C., 102).

In these instances, as in all decisions about anointing, the priest is to make a careful, pastoral judgment, "without scruple," about whether the sick person's condition warrants the care represented by anointing; if necessary, a doctor may be consulted before deciding (see P.C., 8). Some form of serious impairment due to sickness or old age is the criterion for judgment. The simple fact of illness or advanced age is not sufficient reason (P.C., 108). Pastoral care and responsibility require that in each case the priest know the sick person's condition in order to ensure that this sacramental ministry of the community of faith is brought to bear at the proper time and with those persons who are in true need and able to benefit from it.

JAMES M. SCHELLMAN

SICK, COMMUNAL ANOINTING OF THE

Anointing of the sick has been one of the most universally well-received revisions of the post-Vatican II liturgical renewal, especially in its communal format now sanctioned de jure by the new Code of Canon Law (1002). This wide-sweeping reform has meant a transformation of what had earlier been the most misunderstood (fatalism associated with "last rites"), most unliturgical (minimalism in celebration), and most uncommunal (one-on-one encounter with priest) of all the seven sacraments of the church. Ecumenically, communal anointings have always been practiced by the Eastern Orthodox churches in an elaborate service (euchelaion) whenever possible involving seven concelebrating priests, and more recently are now celebrated by the member churches of the Anglican Communion and the Lutheran church.

The Tradition

Communal anointings find a precedent in the oldest full ritual for the application of the oil of the sick dating from the early 9th century. Prior to this time the only extant sources have to do with the blessing of the oil by the bishop. The rite, a Carolingian composition from Roman, Gallican, and Mozarabic sources, was concelebrated by the presbyters (Jas 5:14-15) and included sung chants. The service begins with introductory prayers "for visiting the sick" and presumes the sick Christian is still able to "bend the knee or knees" and participate in the liturgy. The priests are enjoined to anoint with signs of the cross on the neck and on the throat, and between the shoulders and on the breast, or to anoint further "the place where the pain is more pronounced" while an accompanying prayer of supplication is said. The rite concludes with holy communion, which, together with the anointing, is to be repeated for seven days. The later association of anointing with death bed reconciliation led to a privatization of the sacrament (extreme unction) whose effects were often improperly confused with penance and viaticum.

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy declared a preference for the name "anointing of the sick" over "extreme unction" and suggested the earliest possible time for the anointing (Sacrosanctum concilium [S.C.], 73). The same document also restated that sacraments are celebrations of the church and their communal celebration is to be preferred (S.C., 26, 27). Perhaps the most significant teaching of the Second Vatican Council on this sacrament is found in the Constitution on the Church: "By the sacred anointing of the sick and the prayer of the priests the whole Church commends those who are ill to the suffering and glorified Lord, that he may raise them up and save them. And indeed she exhorts them to contribute to the good of the People of God by freely uniting themselves to the passion and death of Christ" (Lumen gentium, 11). This statement both contextualizes the anointing squarely within the life and ministry of the church and recognizes the church itself as a fundamental sacrament which brings the healing strength and grace of Jesus Christ to its afflicted members. This communal context is conveyed in the very title of the typical edition Ordo Unctionis infirmorum eorumque pastoralis curae (1972), first translated as Rite of anointing and Pastoral Care of the Sick (1974), and in the subsequent I.C.E.L. revision as Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (1983).

Liturgical Celebration

What was once the most misunderstood of sacraments is now restored to its original meaning as an anointing of sick Christians who are "seriously impaired by sickness or old age" (8). What was once the least communal of sacraments is now a liturgical celebration wherever possible involving a representative gathering of the faithful, from family members and medical personnel who care for the sick to a large scale celebration in a parish or cathedral church. What was once the least liturgical of sacraments now has two attractive settings (chap. 4): "anointing outside Mass" and "anointing within Mass." The structure for both rites is similar: introductory rites (greeting, optional sprinkling with holy water, instruction/reception of the sick, penitential rite, opening prayer, liturgy of the word, liturgy of the anointing which may be followed by holy communion outside Mass, and concluding blessing. The liturgy of the anointing consists of: a litany, the laying on of hands, the prayer over the oil, the anointing, and the prayer after anointing.

In the litany the interceding church prays for all the sick and for those who care for them. The last petition serves as a transition to the laying on of hands by the priests. This biblical gesture of healing and basic sacramental sign should be a deliberate action done in prayerful silence. The oil used for the anointing should be blessed by the bishop at the annual Chrism Mass, in which case the priest prays a prayer of thanksgiving over the oil. When pastoral need arises, the priest himself is empowered to bless the oil. In either case it is advisable that vessels with oil, preferably crystal or glass, replace the tiny oil stocks stuffed with cotton. Even better, a single larger container could be placed on a table (not the altar) in the sanctuary and the oil later transferred to smaller vessels to be applied by the concelebrating priests. The prayer of anointing reflects the church's theology of the sacrament and is drawn from Jas 5:14-15, the teaching of the Council of Trent, and from the earlier anointing prayer. Anointing the forehead the priest prays: "Through this holy anointing may the Lord in his love and mercy help you with the grace of the Holy Spirit. Amen."

Anointing the hands he continues: "May the Lord who frees you from sin save you and raise you up. Amen." After this, an appropriate prayer after anointing is said.

Pastoral Provisions

Communal anointings have deservedly become a regular feature in the life of many parishes. Usually the anointing takes place within Mass, a unique opportunity to provide an inspiring and reverent eucharistic celebration for those unable to participate regularly at Mass. Provision for anointing at a Sunday eucharistic assembly also has much to commend itself in terms of participation and the priority the parish assigns to its ministry to the sick. Preparation for the service is important. Essential is a prior catechesis on the meaning of illness in salvation history, the grace of anointing, and the parish's ministry to the sick and afflicted. As far as possible, those to be anointed should be known to the pastoral ministers and prepared in advance. The list of communion calls in the parish is a good place to begin to extend an invitation; transportation to and from the church may also need to be provided. Indiscriminate anointing of everyone in the church regardless of their condition is an abuse which will serve only to trivialize the sacrament; the family and participating parishioners are there to support the sick with their prayers and faith. Environmental considerations presume a church building completely accessible to handicapped persons and a seating arrangement which allows access to the sick during the laying on of hands and the anointing. The ministers for the celebration will hopefully include a full complement of ordained and non-ordained (choir/leader of song, servers, readers, eucharistic ministers). Sung acclamations enhance the participation of the congregation. A program or booklet in large print easily legible which incorporates devotional prayers and readings for use afterwards can serve as a remembrance and ongoing support for those anointed. A reception or meal provided by parish groups can prolong the spirit of communal concern and love which reflects the healing the risen Christ extends to the suffering members of his body.

See Sick, pastoral care of the

Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (Washington, DC: I.C.E.L., 1982). Charles W. Gusmer, And You Visited Me: Sacramental Ministry to the Sick and the Dying, rev. ed., New York: Pueblo, 1989).

CHARLES W. GUSMER

SICK, COMMUNION TO THE

In the earliest full account of a Sunday eucharistic assembly at Rome, St. Justin Martyr concludes with an injunction that deacons are to bring holy communion to those Christians unable to be present (Apologia 1, 67). Today not only priests and deacons, but also lay eucharistic ministers may be entrusted to bring the bread of life and cup of salvation to the sick. Indeed, as the church has consistently restated, the primary and original reason for eucharistic reservation outside Mass is to provide for communion for the dying (viaticum); secondary reasons are the distribution of communion and adoration of the blessed sacrament (Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass, 35). Especially appropriate is the public dismissal of the eucharistic minister from Sunday Mass in order to bring communion to those confined at home: in this way communion to the sick is seen as an extension of the parish's eucharistic assembly.

For those instances when Mass is not able to be celebrated in the presence of the sick, chap. 3 of Pastoral Care of the Sick provides two liturgical formats: "Communion in Ordinary Circumstances" and "Communion in a Hospital or Institution." "Communion in Ordinary Circumstances" would regularly be used for visits to the homes of the sick, where family and friends may also communicate. The introductory rites include a greeting, optional sprinkling with holy water, penitential rite (or sacrament of penance). The liturgy of the word is an important new feature. In addition to one of the five options from John's gospel, virtually any passage of scripture may be proclaimed. Part III of the ritual provides a rich selection of readings. The response to the reading may be silence or a brief explanation of scripture. The general intercessions, which may be created spontaneously, give the sick person the opportunity to unite his/her sufferings with the crucified and risen Lord for the work of the church and the salvation of the world. The liturgy of holy communion follows the revised order of Mass beginning with the Lord's Prayer. In addition to the traditional words of showing the eucharistic bread ("This is the Lamb of God . . ."), a new option is provided: "This is the bread of life. Taste and see that the Lord is good."

Communion may be offered under both forms of bread and wine; sick persons unable to communicate under the form of bread may receive communion under the form of wine alone. The rite concludes with a blessing: ordained ministers may further make a sign of the cross with whatever remains of the blessed sacrament.

"Communion in a Hospital or Institution" is an abbreviation of the normative fuller rite for situations when there are many communicants. Ideally, the residents or patients could be gathered in groups with several assisting ministers of communion. Even when the full rite is not used, elements such as the scripture reading may be added to the simplified format. Beginning in the church, hospital chapel, or first room, the minister prays one of a choice of three antiphons: the traditional Sacrum convivium or two scriptural alternates. The Liturgy of Holy Communion consists of a greeting, the Lord's Prayer, and holy communion. The rite concludes with a prayer.

In both manners of communicating the sick an attitude of joyful reverence should prevail. At home a table covered with a linen cloth and candles can serve to promote this reverence. In hospitals and institutions every effort should be made to find an appropriate time to create a proper environment of worship so that holy communion can be received as an act of faith. Pastoral Care highlights why the most important visits to the sick are those in which sacramental communion is received: "In receiving the body and blood of Christ, the sick are united sacramentally to the Lord and are reunited with the eucharistic community from which illness has separated them" (51).

Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (Washington, DC: I.C.E.L., 1982). Charles W. Gusmer, And You Visited Me: Sacramental Ministry to the Sick and the Dying, rev. ed. (New York: Pueblo, 1989).

CHARLES W. GUSMER

SICK, MINISTRY OF THE

Human life is permeated with paradox. The joy and pleasure of the act of conception result in the risk and pain of childbirth. The rich process of physical, mental, and spiritual development is pervaded by the anxiety that accompanies all human growth. And the grand promise of youth and health must eventually come to terms with the experience of limitation, illness, debilitation, and, ultimately, death. Promise and pain bracket human life at every turn.

The creation story of Genesis reveals that God did not intend the great gift of human life to be experienced in this way. In Genesis, suffering and death are shown to be intruders in the creator's original design. They reveal humanity's separation from God, the result of our fallen state. By human choice, sin entered the created order, and with it, death.

Jesus Christ, the Word incarnate, was sent by God into this ruptured creation to reclaim it and humanity for God. Jesus suffered. Jesus entered into the very heart of the paradox of human life by willingly embracing death on the cross. By raising him to life, God overcame death and restored humanity within the original, creative design revealed in Genesis. This does not mean that suffering and death have been removed from human experience, but that they have been conquered and made salvific, the very means of eternal life.

It is within the context of the mystery of Christ's dying and rising that Christians who are sick are seen to have a ministry to the community of faith and to the world as a whole. With Christ, they stand in the center of the paradox of life, the grandeur of its promise and the inclination to hopelessness with which it is rife because of suffering and the certainty of death. On the one hand, by their active struggle against illness, the sick members of the community of faith witness to the fact that sickness and suffering are evil and alien to God's plan for creation. In this they proclaim the goodness and gift of life and the greatness of humanity's place within the created order. As the introduction to Pastoral Care of the Sick (P.C.) states: "Part of the plan laid out by God's providence is that we should fight strenuously against all sickness and carefully seek the blessings of good health, so that we may fulfill our role in human society and in the Church" (3).

On the other hand, by their willing acceptance of the suffering that they cannot avoid, Christians who are sick experience and witness to the reality and mystery of suffering: "...their faith helps them to grasp more deeply the mystery of suffering and to bear their pain with greater courage" (P.C., 1). In the heart of this mystery they discover that the experience of suffering need not be one of futility and despair. In union with Christ's own suffering and death, these old enemies of the human race, these strangers to God's creative intent have been transformed into the means of grace and salvation: "From Christ's own words they know that sickness has meaning and value for their own salvation and for the salvation of the world" (P.C., 1). By embracing the suffering that is theirs as members of a flawed yet beloved race, the sick unite themselves with the sufferings of Christ and help witness to and achieve the restoration of all in Christ: "...we should always be prepared to fill up what is lacking in Christ's sufferings for the salvation of the world as we look forward to creation's being set free in the glory of the children of God—see Colossians 1:24; Romans 8:19-21" (P.C., 3).

Christians who are sick minister to the well first and foremost by being witnesses to and embodiments of these fundamental truths of Christian revelation. It is in this sense that Pastoral Care of the Sick says "...the role of the sick in the Church is to be a reminder to others of the essential or higher things. By their witness the sick show that our mortal life must be redeemed through the mystery of Christ's death and resurrection" (P.C., 3). By their struggle with illness they recall the community of faith to its belief in the fundamental good of created life as a gift of God. And by associating themselves "willingly with the passion and death of Christ" (P.C., 5), they share with him the cost of redeeming that mortal life.

By facing the reality of sickness, the weakness, dependency, and fear that it entails, the sick Christian can help the Christian community and society as a whole acknowledge and accept the fundamental frailty of human nature that all people experience, whether or not they are sick. The denial of this reality can succeed only temporarily and is not without cost both for the individual and for society. In the individual who attempts it, this denial can result in an incapacity to deal with the changes and chances of life and one's own weaknesses. It can also mean an unwillingness to see change in others and can result in anger at the sight of one's own unacknowledged weaknesses reflected in others. These characteristics can also be evident on a larger stage in societies where frailty and the nonproductivity associated with it are viewed as having no value. In such a society the infirm and aged are relegated to the margins of the normal life of the group and even may be viewed with disdain. They are potentially painful reminders of a fundamental frailty that no one wants to admit, and within a social structure where measurable productivity is the gauge of personal worth.

The tendency in each of us and in the society we inhabit to deny human weakness and dependency is the outcome of fear, a fear which has its roots in an abiding sense of our mortality. Sickness puts us in touch with mortality, our own and others', in a direct and inescapable way. And those who are sick can minister to the well by showing them first of all that this fear is not to be denied, that it has positive value and rests on a true intuition that things were not meant to be like this. Second, the sick can help the rest learn that this fear can be faced and thereby become the way to hope and healing, the occasion for coming to an acceptance of our full humanity.

The sick are not, then, in a marginal relationship with the rest of human society. Even less so are they on the periphery of the Christian community. They have an essential role at the very heart of the mystery of Jesus, dead and risen. The gospels portray Jesus as having a constant concern for the sick and infirm, whom he sought out, consoled, healed. Jesus recognized that in their weakened or impaired condition the sick were allowed only a marginal existence in society. Some were considered outcasts. Jesus' ministry to them was at one and the same time an affirmation that such suffering was the result of an evil completely opposed to his Father's design and a proclamation of the kingdom that he came to inaugurate, a kingdom heralded by Jesus' own divine compassion and healing. And in his utter self-giving on the cross Jesus suffered fully the effects of the evil loose in the world. In Jesus we see the face of a God who is forever at one with the abandoned, the destitute, the victim, all who experience hopelessness. The whole of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection show us a God passionately attached to us, to our restoration and the restoration of all creation.

The community of faith needs those who are sick to teach it about the vulnerability of God in Christ, who "is still pained and tormented in his members, made like him" (P.C., 2). The sick teach the community about Christian hope found paradoxically in human vulnerability when united to Christ, the suffering servant. In the face of a society which can view the sick only as those who are in need and for whom so much must be done, the Christian community proclaims the place and dignity of the sick by the very way in which it loves, cares for, and depends upon them. And even as the community encourages them to offer their sufferings in union with Christ, it relies upon them to pray, in the privileged way that is theirs by virtue of this union, for the whole church and for the entire world: for peace in the world, for the many needs of the church, for individuals and families in crisis, for all those caught up in the mystery of human sufferings, whether in body, mind, or spirit (see P.C., 56).

JAMES M. SCHELLMAN

SICK, PASTORAL CARE OF THE

Following the commandment implicit in the last judgment parable recorded in Mt 25:34-40, the church has long included visiting the sick among the corporal works of mercy urged upon all the faithful. The tradition of assisting, encouraging and praying with the sick and their families and friends is the bedrock upon which is based all of the church's pastoral care of the sick. That tradition has taken ritual form in a variety of ways as the Christian assembly and its ministers have gathered over the centuries to pray and to share communion with the sick as well as to anoint them with oil in the name of the Lord. Although the term "pastoral care" has sometimes been preempted in our day to name the work of professionally accredited chaplains in health care institutions, this article will focus upon the older and enduring tradition of ritual pastoral care of the sick which frames their efforts. Moreover, it will focus upon that tradition largely as it has come to be actualized in the current Roman Catholic book of rites for the sick entitled Pastoral Care of the Sick (P.C.).

Sickness and Healing

Experience. Sickness and healing are terms defined by human experience interpreted through the double lens of personality and culture. Sickness is a process; it may begin in a disorder of the body, but it reaches out to encompass the human spirit in both its individual and its social dimensions. In time of illness, whether acute, chronic, or terminal, the human person confronts the limit imposed by bodiliness on the limitless desire of the spirit for life, meaning, and love. The ultimate expression of that limit is death. In some sense, therefore, every illness conceals within it a taste of one's own mortality, whether consciously recognized or not.

Death is the boundary of human hope. Sickness deprives us of the future we had imagined. The deprivation may be temporary, if the illness interferes only briefly with our plans for this day or this week or this month; or it may be permanent, if the illness threatens to end in death. Hope may be understood as that act of the imagination whereby we project the future as both possible and desirable. Sickness, then, may cast us into a crisis of hope. To the extent that we order our lives within the future as we imagine it, loss of that future may provoke the concomitant loss of our sense of purpose in life. Bereft of our usual goals, we may feel that our life has no meaning or value. In this sense, sickness induces a crisis of faith defined not as religious belief but as trust in life as ultimately meaningful. Finally, sickness may disrupt the ordinary relationships of which our lives are made: our relationship with ourselves as integrated body-persons perceived to be free and responsible; our relationship with other people; and, if we are religious people, our relationship with God. When our survival is threatened, we tend to concentrate our energies upon ourselves and our own needs. In this sense, sickness provokes a crisis of love. Potentially, then, sickness, as a confrontation with mortality, whether hidden or overt, creates for the sick a threefold crisis of hope, faith and love.

Nor is this crisis confined to the sick alone. It may extend to any whose lives are touched and affected by the sickness of a family member, friend, co-worker, fellow parishioner. Sickness calls into question the hopes, the goals, the relationships of the whole community within which it occurs. Sickness, then, is not a mere bodily reality but a total human experience shared, to some extent, by the social world to which the sick person belongs.

The ways in which both the sick person and the surrounding society interpret and respond to this experience are largely determined both by personality and by culture. Contemporary technological cultures tend to respond with medical structures and tools ordered to the cure of the physiological component of the illness, without regard for its spiritual or social dimensions. The movement toward a more holistic approach to medical care is based upon a larger vision of both sickness and healing as human and social processes. The experience of sickness described above generates a corresponding description of healing as a social process directed toward the transformation of the threefold crisis of hope, faith and love as it is rooted in bodily disorder.

Theological Interpretation. The church's interpretation of sickness and healing is rooted in the mission of Jesus Christ. Biblical imagery captures the goal of that mission in terms of wholeness: persons are healed and forgiven, society becomes a city ruled by the law of love of God and neighbor, the cosmos is made one in Christ. Borrowing upon considerable OT precedent, the gospel especially gathers this vision of salvific transformation into the evocative image of the reign of God, where all reality is brought into harmony. Sickness disrupts this harmony. It fragments the personal integrity of the individual; it disturbs relationships within society; it is ordered toward the ultimate disruption of death. Sickness therefore stands in contradiction to the reign of God. It is a manifestation of the chaotic reign of evil from which creation is to be redeemed. The evangelists frequently depict Jesus healing the sick as a sign of the in-breaking of the reign of God upon the chaos of a world under the rule of sin and death. In the new Jerusalem, sickness and suffering, sin and death, will be no more. The work of healing is therefore an expression of the work of redemption.

Ministerial Response. The church's ministry to the sick is necessarily also rooted in the mission of Jesus Christ. Healing in the fullest sense addresses all the dimensions of sickness. It has both a medical and a pastoral component. As Jesus cured the sick, so Christians throughout the ages have undertaken medical work for the sake of the gospel. The church has a long history of sponsoring hospices and hospitals for the physical as well as the spiritual care of the sick. However, healing done in the name of Jesus Christ is essentially a soteriological action. Every aspect of Jesus' life and ministry serves the one purpose, summarized in Mk 1:14f., of calling all people to conversion and acceptance of the reign of God. That acceptance implies commitment to a way of life. To heal the sick in Jesus' name, therefore, is to invite them into the reign of God as their way of life. In this context, whatever physical cure may take place is a bodily taste of the deeper healing which embraces every dimension of the human person affected by sickness. While a total cure is always desirable, it is not always possible. Moreover, it is always temporary. Cured of one ailment, we will eventually sicken from another until, inevitably, death claims us in the end. True healing consists less in cure than in conversion. To recall the terms used above to describe the human experience of sickness, the Christian work of healing invokes the power of God made available in Jesus Christ to enable the sick and all who participate in their sickness to resolve whatever aspects of the crisis of hope, faith and love stand in the way of their wholehearted commitment to the life of the reign of God. Healing, then, is a corporal work of mercy which embraces the whole person both as individual and as social being.

Rites for the Sick

The full title of the 1982 English-language edition of the Roman church's rite for the sick is Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (P.C.). This title reflects the growing recognition that ritual constitutes a core expression of the church's ministry of pastoral care. The ritual book itself reflects that same awareness. In 1963, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican II mandated specific reforms with regard to the sacrament of anointing itself and the order of the sacraments given to the dying (S.C., 73-75). In 1972, the Latin Ordo unctionis infirmorum eorumque pastoralis curae, drawn up in response, took significant steps toward situating the sacraments of anointing and viaticum in the context of a larger vision of pastoral care of the sick which includes both theological reflection on the experience of sickness and pastoral directives for the medical care and community support of the sick. The International Commission on English in the Liturgy (I.C.E.L.) published the provisional English translation of the text in 1973 under the literal title Rite of Anointing and Pastoral Care of the Sick (R.A.P.C.S.). After a lengthy period of consultation, I.C.E.L. published the definitive text in 1982 under the present title. This version, approved for use in the United States in 1983, represents an adaptation rather than a mere retranslation of the Latin text. P.C. furthers the movement toward situating the sacraments within the context of a vision of pastoral care through the addition of new pastoral notes, especially a theological reflection on communion for the sick, new texts for particular circumstances, and new rites for visiting and praying with both sick adults and sick children. It supplies the minister's need for access to other rites by reprinting relevant portions of the rites of Christian initiation, penance, and funerals.

General Principles

In the context of care for the sick, there is a risk of interpreting the church's rites primarily as a form of pastoral "medicine," administered by professionals with an eye to curing the sick. The theological manifestation of this image of the rites is a preoccupation with identifying their effects. While that is a legitimate theological enterprise to which this article will indeed attend below, it distorts the nature of the church's ritual care for the sick if it fails to recognize that the rites are primarily acts of public worship. It is in the context of our corporate surrender to the abiding yet transcendent mystery of God in a characteristically eucharistic action of remembrance and thanksgiving that we invoke God's saving intervention for those caught up in the experience of sickness. In this context, the sick themselves, as well as all those who participate in their sickness as social process, are themselves invited by the very nature of the act to surrender in remembrance and thanksgiving. To return to the terms introduced earlier, they are challenged and supported by the worshipping community to entrust themselves to God in hope, in faith and in love. It is in this rehearsal of the Christian act of death that they are healed, whether or not any physical cure takes place.

For this reason, all of the rites for the sick must be interpreted and celebrated in light of the principles of liturgical worship established through the process of liturgical reform since Vatican II. The symbolic character of Christian liturgical worship must be fully respected: symbols must be permitted to speak in depth and in power (cf. P.C., 107). As is evident from the structure and texts provided in P.C., the central symbols common to all the rites are the Christian assembly and the proclamation of the word of God. A communal celebration of the rites is always to be preferred over the semi-private forms long familiar in pastoral practice (cf. S.C., 27; P.C., 33). The dialogic structure of each rite clearly presupposes the presence and participation of a community, however minimal. The rubrics consistently provide for the ordinary distribution of liturgical ministries where circumstances permit. The pastoral notes urge a communal rather than a private form of celebration whenever possible. Moreover, every rite includes a liturgy of the word which may be as brief as a few sentences from the gospel or as long as that of the Sunday eucharist, depending upon the condition of the sick. Only a medical emergency or an insuperable shortage of ministers justifies the omission of the word (e.g., P.C., 78; cf. 149). (P.C.) Part III provides an extensive lectionary imaginatively addressed to the crisis of faith, hope and love as it might occur in almost every dimension of the experience of sickness. Like most of the reformed liturgical books of the Roman rite, (P.C.) offers little in the way of explicit directives concerning the environment and music for worship. However, precisely because the rites for the sick are ecclesial acts of public prayer, they are subject to the same norms for symbolic ritual action as all of the other rites in the Christian liturgical repertoire. Pastoral sensitivity to the reality of the human sufferer suggests the wisdom of an attentive concern for the nonverbal dimensions of worship in the midst of the emotional and physical disruptions engendered by sickness.

Prayer

Family members, friends, and members of the faith community encourage, support and challenge the sick by gathering to pray with and for them. Both the OT and NT contain stories of miraculous cures attributed to the power of the prayer of a recognized prophet or healer, including Jesus himself (e.g., Jn 11:41-44). The description of the rite of anointing found in Jas 5:14-16 emphasizes the power of the prayer of faith, rather than the act of anointing itself, to "save" and "raise up" the sick. No doubt the custom of praying with and for the sick continued unabated in Christian communities long before it was formalized in the prayers and Masses for the sick found in the medieval liturgical books and in subsequent church rituals down to the present day. P.C. repeatedly urges pastoral ministers and family members to pray with the sick on occasions other than those marked by sacramental celebrations (e.g., 34). Ordained ministers are encouraged to pray with the sick and dying as public representatives of the ecclesial community (e.g., 44). Visitors are urged to share with the sick the word of God, especially as it has been proclaimed in the gatherings of the assembly from which the sick person was absent (46). They are also encouraged to pray the psalms and other prayers (46). Unlike its 1973 predecessor, P.C., (Part I) provides sample rites for prayer with sick adults and sick children. Both rites are modeled on the pattern of the liturgy of the word, to which are added the Lord's Prayer, a closing prayer, and a concluding blessing. P.C. (Part II) includes biblical and other texts for the community's use in praying with the dying and for the dead. Several of the prayers given for the commendation of the dying are taken from the early medieval European liturgical books which contain the prayers used by the church to accompany its dying members on the journey from deathbed to grave. Through prayer, the church seeks to sustain the dying Christian in a union with the pasch of Christ "until it is brought to fulfillment after death" (P.C., 212). In addition to praying with the sick and dying, the community of worship is urged to remember and to pray at the regular Sunday assembly for those whom sickness has taken from their midst (e.g., P.C., 43). Prayer, then, is the essential thread which binds into one, every aspect of the church's multi-faceted pastoral care of the sick.

Communion of the Sick and Dying

Eucharistic communion is the sacramental means through which the sick participate in the paschal mystery of Jesus Christ. It is also the sacramental means through which the community of faith and worship, divided by the absence of its sick members, is restored to communion in the one body of Christ (cf. P.C. 73). When death is imminent, the dying Christian receives communion under the title of viaticum, "food for the passage through death to eternal life" (P.C., 75).

History. In his First Apology (ca. A.D. 150), Justin Martyr made the statement that the deacons distributed the bread and wine to those who are present at the eucharistic celebration and took them to those who are absent. In the 3rd and 4th centuries, authors as scattered geographically as Hippolytus in Rome, Tertullian and Cyprian in North Africa, and Basil the Great in Caesarea, took for granted the custom of lay Christians reserving and receiving at home bread brought from the community's eucharist, perhaps with a cup of wine which they themselves blessed as part of this domestic communion rite. This practice seems to have continued in some places until the 7th or 8th century, but it began to diminish after the 4th century. Although the texts cited did not single out the sick and dying for specific mention, such persons were no doubt numbered among those who took communion outside the community celebration.

Other sources do attest to the custom of communicating the sick and dying. Where reliable medical care was unavailable, every sickness could and frequently did result in death. Therefore, it is not possible to distinguish communion for the sick from viaticum for the dying through much of the church's history. The church of the martyrs especially placed great emphasis on the importance of the eucharist as the sacramental anticipation of the Christian's literal participation in the pasch of Christ through death. As the Christian community adopted and adapted the Greek and Latin customs of providing their dead with a coin as fare for their journey after death across the river Styx, they gradually narrowed their use of this imagery of viaticum to the eucharist received in immediate preparation for death, whether death by violence or death by disease.

Beginning with the Council of Nicaea in 325, church legislation has repeatedly insisted on the importance of providing communion for the dying. Similarly, hagiography is filled with stories indicating the value placed on eucharist as the one necessary food for those facing death. So well was this lesson taken to heart that church councils in West and East from the 4th through the 7th centuries found it necessary to reiterate their condemnation of placing the eucharist in the mouth of those already dead, a Christian echo of the older customs of Greece and Rome.

Prior to the medieval clericalization of all eucharistic ministries, communion was given either by ordained ministers, by laypeople, or, in some instances, even by the sick themselves. Formal rituals for the communion of the sick and dying began to emerge in the Western church in the 8th century. According to the oldest surviving texts, viaticum was to be given in the context of prayer and the proclamation of the passion according to St. John. Medieval sources later described three types of rituals: a church rite, sometimes quite elaborate in its ritual and sometimes inclusive of penance before and anointing after communion; a home eucharist, probably using special Mass formularies composed for such occasions, until such home Masses were forbidden by Rome; or, most commonly, a home communion service using the reserved sacrament in a format eventually patterned on the communion rite at Mass, at times preceded by a biblical reading. Until the 12th century, communion was given to the sick under both kinds, though for practical reasons intinction had commonly replaced the cup by the 9th century. The Rituale Romanum of 1614 made no distinction between communion for the sick and viaticum for the dying. The priest was the sole minister of both, which were given only under the form of the bread.

Today, the Roman church presently possesses two distinct but similar rituals for the communion of the sick and viaticum for the dying: Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass (1973) and P.C. (1982). Following the instruction Immensae caritatis (1973), authorizing the appointment of lay ministers of communion to the sick, Holy Communion Outside Mass provides a form for the administration of communion or viaticum to be used only by lay ministers, while P.C. offers forms to be used by priests, deacons, and lay ministers alike. Both rituals contain long and short forms for the communion of the sick, but P.C. discourages minimizing the full rite (78). This full rite includes: introductory rites (greeting; optional sprinkling with holy water, penitential rite), the liturgy of the word (reading/s, response, general intercessions), the liturgy of holy communion (Lord's Prayer, communion, silent prayer, prayer after communion) and a concluding blessing. In both rituals, viaticum is distinguished from communion not only by the use of texts referring specifically to the advent of death but also by the inclusion of the baptismal profession of faith renewed by the dying person and the optional apostolic pardon given to the dying person. P.C. also recommends a sign of peace shared with the dying person. In addition, P.C. provides rites for the celebration of viaticum both within and outside Mass. The rituals offer a great degree of flexibility to allow for the condition of the sick or dying person as a primary criterion for determining what is to be included in the celebration.

Symbols. The central symbols of the rite of communion for the sick or dying, apart from the assembly and the word of God common to all the rites found in P.C., are the bread and wine blessed, broken, and shared in grateful remembrance of Jesus Christ's dying and rising. It is not possible in this brief space to explore the full depths of the eucharistic images called into play in the rites of communion and viaticum. Let a few hints suffice to invite the pastoral imagination of presiders, homilists, and musicians to draw out in the celebration the multi-faceted invitation to hope, to faith, and to love offered to the sick and dying, as well as their co-sufferers, in these rites. The eucharistic meal recalls such human experiences as hunger and thirst felt and satisfied, especially in the context of a meal shared with others. Hunger and thirst are experiences of mortality: deprived of food and drink, our very bodies know that they face certain death. Moreover, hunger and thirst may carry hints of human isolation; without a wide web of social cooperation, we cannot eat or drink. In time of famine, we discover the truth of our commitment to the common enterprise of our humanity; we deprive ourselves to feed others' hunger or we fight one another for the few available resources. The sick and dying must face their mortality, with all its attendant isolation. To provide them with food and drink is therefore a significant action. To share food and drink with them from the community's common table, is equally so. Moreover, this food and drink assuage more than the body's hunger and thirst for life. It dispels more than the basic loneliness of the human person. The rite of communion draws upon the rich biblical tradition of manna given by a delivering God to the Israelites facing starvation in the desert (Exodus 16), of water flowing from the rock for those who thirst (Exod 17:1-7), of food and wine provided in abundance at the table of God's kingdom where all the nations are gathered in from their isolation (e.g., Isa 25:6-8). It calls upon such stories as those of the prophet Elijah, discouraged and calling for death, being given bread and water so he could journey on to the mountain where he was to meet God (1 Kgs 19:4-8). It invokes especially the central imagery of the body and blood of Christ, given over and shared on the cross and at the table so that all who receive it in the memorial meal may be gathered into one in the paschal body of Christ in the journey through death to life everlasting. In these rites, there is nourishment for the human spirit in its confrontation with a world potentially reduced to chaos by the prospect of our common death.

The two Roman communion rituals differ slightly in the way they incorporate the symbolic actions of sharing the bread and wine blessed and broken at the community's table. Both rites do emphasize that communion must always be perceived in relationship to the assembly's eucharistic celebration (Holy Communion, 13, 15; P.C., 73). P.C. provides a new theological introduction to the rite of communion for the sick which stresses that the purpose of that communion is not only to unite the sick person to the paschal Christ but also to reunite the eucharistic assembly divided by sickness (73). Representatives sent from the sick persons' ordinary community of worship rather than from a health care facility's chaplaincy department are clearly assumed to be the ordinary ministers of communion to the sick and dying. Moreover, they are encouraged to take communion "from the community's eucharistic celebration," especially from the Sunday eucharist (73). Holy Communion Outside Mass seems to imply that communion and viaticum are given either under the form of bread or under the form of wine, depending upon the condition of the communicant. The pastoral directives accompanying the rites of communion and viaticum in P.C. state that communion may be given under the form of wine alone if the communicant is unable to swallow the eucharistic bread (74), but they make no reference to communion under the form of bread alone. In fact, the pastoral notes affixed to the rite of viaticum state specifically that "The minister should choose the manner of giving communion under both kinds which is suitable in the particular case" (181). This statement is followed by detailed instructions for the storage and transporting of the consecrated wine. Moreover, the actual rites for communion and viaticum seem to assume communion under both kinds as the norm.

Anointing of the Sick

The anointing of the sick is central to the church's ritual pastoral care of the sick. However, it gathers in and focuses the many manifestations of God's healing love provided by the Christian community through their neighborly concern, prayer, visits, and eucharistic ministry. It does not supplant them.

History. The biblical foundation for the sacrament of anointing lies in the healing work of Jesus Christ. The NT contains only two references to an actual anointing of the sick with oil. Mk 6:13, describing the mission of the twelve, simply notes that they cast out demons and healed the sick, anointing them with oil. The association of healing with exorcism appears to be of greater theological interest than this single gospel mention of anointing. Jas 5:14-16 presents a more formal ecclesial rite of anointing the sick. The leaders are the church elders. The recipient is a sick person who is evidently well enough to send for the elders but not well enough to go to the community's place of worship. The ritual consists of prayer and anointing in the name of the Lord. The effect, attributed more to the prayer of faith than to the act of anointing, is that the Lord will "save," "raise up," and if necessary, forgive the sins of the sick person. The meaning of the verbs "save" and "raise up" has been much disputed among scholars who have sought in them an answer to the question of whether the proper effect of the sacrament is a spiritual healing in preparation for death or a physical healing. Most scholars today prefer a more holistic interpretation consonant with biblical anthropology: it is the entire person who is healed through the church's prayer.

Prior to the Carolingian reform in the West, the practice of anointing did not actually follow the ritual pattern set out in the letter of James. Surviving texts of prayers of blessing over the oil, hagiographic writings, and patristic letters and sermons suggest that the faithful developed the custom of taking home the oil blessed by the bishop at the community's eucharist. When illness struck, the sick drank the oil, rubbed it on the afflicted part, rubbed it over the entire body, or others applied it for them. The sick may or may not have been dying, although, as noted above, illness could lead swiftly and unpredictably to death for those who had no access to reliable medical attention. The texts indicate that the blessed oil was used for healing. However, it is an oversimplification to say that the intended effect was simply a physical cure. Anointing with blessed oil was clearly seen to be a religious act invoking the healing power of God over whatever powers of evil or sin were at work in the sick person.

The 9th-century Carolingian reform confirmed the trend toward the clericalization and ritualization of the church's ministry to the sick. Priests were called to the bedside of dying Christians to administer the sacrament of penance, available only once and therefore often delayed until the moment of death. The ritual books that began to appear for their use provided additional prayers for the sick and dying, including rites of anointing and viaticum. The rite of penance preserved the vestiges of the older practice according to which one was admitted to the order of penitents, lived a penitential life for some time, and then was reconciled to the community through absolution. In the case of a deathbed visit, the sick person was admitted to the order of penitents, and then either anointed and reconciled or reconciled and anointed. Viaticum often followed, though it might sometimes be given at another time. The prayers accompanying the rite of anointing took on strongly penitential overtones from their context. When the two sacraments of penance and anointing were eventually separated, anointing retained its penitential character and even penitential consequences. Anointing was sometimes interpreted as a consecration of the dying. Once anointed, the sick person who recovered, as if one returned from the dead, was expected to live a spiritualized, even penitential life, until death. Moreover, like deathbed penance, the anointing came to be considered unrepeatable. Finally, the ritual became increasingly elaborate as anointings and other aspects of the rite were multiplied. These factors caused the faithful to delay the anointing whenever possible until the moment of death, if they received it at all. Thus anointing became in practice a penitential sacrament administered by priests, using oil blessed by the bishop, exclusively to the dying.

This was the practice for which the theologians of the schools fashioned their theological explanation. Although some early Scholastics continued to hold that the sacrament of anointing could effect a physical cure, the predominant opinion came to be that a sacrament, a means of supernatural grace infallibly effective in the recipient rightly disposed, could not be said to confer a bodily cure as its primary effect, especially as, in fact, few of its dying recipients recovered. Rather, its primary effect was considered to be the healing of the soul afflicted by sin as it prepared for death. However, sacraments do not duplicate one another in their effects. Therefore, the anointing could not be said to replicate the removal of original sin effected by baptism or the remission of personal sin accomplished by sacramental penance. Therefore, it was held to remove either the remnants of sin (Dominicans) or venial sin (Franciscans) in immediate preparation for entry into glory. This interpretation further endorsed the practice of delaying the sacrament until the moment of death. By the 14th century, in most of the Western church, the order of the sacraments of the dying had changed from penance, anointing, and viaticum to penance, viaticum, and anointing. "Extreme unction" had indeed become not only the last of the anointings received by the Christian, as the title had first implied, but also anointing in extremis.

The Council of Trent called for no decisive change of practice. In response to the issues perceived to have been raised by the Reformers, the council stated that the sacrament of anointing was instituted by Christ, though "promulgated by James"; that it confers the grace of the Holy Spirit to remove sin and its remnants, to support and strengthen the recipient through trust in God in the face of suffering and the temptations of the devil, and, if helpful for salvation, to effect a physical healing; and that its proper minister is the ordained priest. However, the council did not entirely endorse the theology of the schools. When presented with a proposed document which would have restricted the administration of the sacrament exclusively to the dying, the council required that the draft be reworded to say that the sacrament is to be given to the sick, "especially to those who are so dangerously ill that they seem near to death."

Although the council thus opened the door to the retrieval of the notion of a sacrament of the sick, both pastoral practice and theological discussion continued most commonly to treat "extreme unction" as the sacrament of the dying. In the late 17th and the 18th centuries, liturgical historians paved the way for

Pope Benedict XIV to speak of the sacrament for the sick which ought to be available to be given more than once. However, it would appear that in practice, the sacrament continued to be administered largely to the dying or the recently dead, on the assumption that the soul might linger in the body even after all physical signs of life had ceased. The neo-scholastic revival of the first part of the 20th century, however, employed a variety of images to reinforce the notion that the purpose of the anointing was to prepare the dying person for glory. Despite the efforts of 20th-century popes to halt the practice of delaying the administration of the sacrament until the person had reached or passed the moment of death, pastoral practice continued for the most part to reflect that theological understanding.

Vatican II, inspired by the historical studies of the scholars of the liturgical movement, endorsed a possible reinterpretation of "extreme unction" by noting that it "may also and more properly be called the anointing of the sick" and that "it is not a sacrament for those only who are at the point of death" (S.C., 73). The council also mandated an adaptation in the number of anointings and the revision of the rite of anointing to "correspond to the varying conditions of the sick who receive the sacrament" (S.C., 75). In response, R.A.P.C.S. provided three rites of anointing, which continue to appear in P.C.: anointing outside Mass, anointing within Mass, and anointing in a hospital or institution. Anointing outside Mass includes introductory rites (greeting, optional sprinkling with holy water, instruction, and penitential rite), a liturgy of the word (reading, response), the liturgy of anointing (litany, laying on of hands, prayer over the oil, anointing, prayer after anointing, the Lord's Prayer), an optional liturgy of holy communion (communion, silent prayer, prayer after communion) and a concluding rite.

Anointing within Mass adds to the structure of an ordinary eucharistic celebration a "reception of the sick" after the greeting, a liturgy of anointing (see above), and a blessing of the sick during the concluding rite. Anointing in a hospital or institution is an abbreviated rite to be used on "those occasions when only the priest and sick person are present and the complete rite cannot be celebrated" (P.C., 149). An even more abbreviated rite of anointing is provided for cases of acute emergency. P.C. not only retranslated these rites but also added new prayers for particular pastoral circumstances. Finally, the council decreed the restoration of the sacraments for the dying to their primitive order: penance, anointing, viaticum, to be given in a continuous rite (S.C., 74). Both R.A.P.C.S. and P.C. comply.

Symbols. The central symbolic actions of the rite of anointing, apart from the gathering of the assembly and the proclamation of the word of God, are the prayer of faith, the laying on of hands, and the anointing with oil (P.C., 104).

The letter of James, as previously noted, identifies the prayer of faith as the key to the effectiveness of the rite of anointing. Like all liturgical actions, the entire rite is structured as an act of prayer on the part of the church, made present in the assembly (P.C., 105) and led in this case by a presiding priest. Only one text appears to identify the "prayer of faith" with the litany prayed for the sick person and the caregivers immediately prior to the laying on of hands (P.C., 121).

The laying on of hands is a gesture widely employed in the sacramental rites of the Roman church. It evokes the human experience of touch as a medium of human relationship and of healing. The human body serves as a boundary which both identifies and separates individual human persons. Touch bridges the separation which, in the case of illness, particularly, easily becomes isolation.

Ritualized touch, done with appropriate reverence, acknowledges and reclaims as valuable the embodied person (cf. P.C. 106) removed from the ordinary relational context precisely by a bodily condition defined by the societal environment as disordered and perhaps even dangerous. Moreover, a religious rite of touch summons and reinterprets within the community's faith horizon every experience of the healing power of the human hand as that power is communicated in the various rituals of the medical world. The laying on of hands evokes not only the human experience of touch but also the biblical stories of hands raised or laid on in a gesture invoking God's Spirit in blessing (e.g., Gen 48:14-17; cf. P.C., 106). Among the blessings of the messianic era, when God's Spirit is poured out in profusion (cf. Joel 3:1), is abundant life, untrammelled by disease or death (cf. Isa 25:7-8; Rev 21:1-4). Jesus touches the sick to heal them (e.g., Lk 4:40; cf. P.C. 106) as a sign of the coming reign of God, where life triumphs over every limit of sickness, suffering and mortality. The text of the rite itself interprets the laying on of hands, done in silence, as an invocation of the Spirit (P.C., 106) in petition for "life and health" (P.C., 121 and par.). The imposition of hands upon the sick in the sacrament of anointing bears ritual echoes of the same gesture as it appears in the sacraments of initiation and penance, with all their overtones of life-giving relationships within the community and with God. This gesture also evokes the biblical and liturgical traditions of conferring the Spirit of God on some members of the community to empower them for a role of responsibility. It is true that P.C. explicitly in its introductory notes (1, 3) and at least tacitly in its rites, acknowledges the responsibility of the sick to participate in Christ's paschal work of redemption for the sake of others as well as themselves. However, although the sick carry out this responsibility in a particular way through their suffering, or perhaps more profoundly, through their conversion in the midst of suffering, they share this mission with all the baptized. Sickness, and its attendant suffering, are interpreted by the rite as an undesirable condition to be overcome with every possible means (3f., 6) so that the sick can return to the more common ways of participating in the redemptive work of Christ incumbent upon every Christian in ordinary daily life. Initiation, then, seems a more appropriate tool than ordination for interpreting the significance of the laying on of hands in the rite of anointing by the light of the meanings acquired by this gesture through its occurrence in the repertoire of sacramental rites taken as a whole. The sick are called to reaffirm and live out their baptismal commitment in the midst of sickness rather than to assume a new, even permanent role in the community as members of some type of "order of the sick."

The anointing with oil is another symbolic action rich in significance. Although frequently disguised under other names, oil is applied to the human body today as a means of beautification, of refreshment, of healing. In the ancient Mediterranean and therefore biblical world, anointing with oil was also used to beautify, to refresh and to heal. In addition, it was used as a sign of festivity, as a mark of honor, as an agent of strength, as a preparation for burial, and, in religious rituals, as a sign of consecration both of persons and of objects. Moreover, the olive oil itself was a primary source of light and of nourishment. In biblical and in extra-biblical Jewish literature, olive oil becomes another sign of the abundance of life in the promised land (e.g., Deut 7:13), a promise to be fulfilled most completely with the coming of the messianic age. Indeed, olive oil flows in the rivers of paradise (2 En 8:5, Ree. A). Its source is the tree of life, seen as the olive tree, whose fruit is healing, even the healing of mortality itself (cf. 2 En 5, Ree. B; Apoc of Moses 9:3; Rev 22:1-2). In the world of Christian symbols, however, the meanings of anointing with oil are gathered together in the person of Jesus Christ, the Anointed One. The rite of anointing the sick calls upon many of these meanings, particularly those referring to healing, to strengthening, and to the invocation of God's Spirit (P.C., 107), the great symbol of life given in abundance (cf. Gen 1:2; 2:7). Ultimately, however, the anointing conforms the sick person to the paschal Christ whose suffering brings about the eschatological refreshment, health, and life of all peoples. Ritually, it echoes again the sacraments of initiation and ordination, but it preserves a certain distinction by making use of the oil blessed specifically for the sick rather than the oil of catechumens or the chrism used in those other rites. The oil is blessed either by the bishop at the Chrism Mass or by the presiding priest during the sacramental rite of anointing the sick, after the laying on of hands. When using oil blessed by the bishop, the priest offers a prayer of thanksgiving over the oil prior to the anointing itself. Obeying the call of Vatican II for an adaptation in the number of anointings (S.C., 75), the priest anoints only the forehead and hands of the sick person, rather than the five senses, while saying the new sacramental form approved by Pope Paul VI in the Apostolic Constitution "Sacrament of the Anointing of the Sick" (1972) and translated into English as: "Through this holy anointing may the Lord in his love and mercy help you with the grace of the Holy Spirit (R. Amen). May the Lord who frees you from sin save you and raise you up" (P.C., 124 and par.). The ritual adds this note: "Depending upon the culture and traditions of the place, as well as the condition of the sick person, the priest may also anoint additional parts of the body, for example, the area of pain or injury. He does not repeat the sacramental forms" (P.C., 124 and par.).

Pastoral Theological Issues. As the practice of anointing the sick continues to develop, at least two major issues remain unresolved. One concerns the subject of the sacrament, the other its minister.

The Subject of the Sacrament. Throughout the complex history of this rite, the theological interpretation of the sacrament's effect and the pastoral decision about who should be anointed have marched hand in hand. Sometimes pastoral practice has determined theology; sometimes theology has determined pastoral practice. With its cautious statement that "extreme unction . . . may also and more properly be called the anointing of the sick" and its exhortation that "it is not a sacrament for those only who are at the point of death" (S.C., 73), Vatican II gave official impetus to the pastoral question of whether the anointing serves primarily the sick or the dying and its theological corollary concerning the nature of the healing conferred by the sacrament. Both the 1973 R.A.P.C.S. and the 1982 P.C. define the effect of the sacrament along Tridentine lines: "This sacrament gives the grace of the Holy Spirit to those who are sick: by this grace the whole person is helped and saved, sustained by trust in God, and strengthened against the temptations of the Evil One and against anxiety over death. Thus the sick person is able not only to bear suffering bravely, but also to fight against it. A return to physical health may follow the reception of this sacrament if it will be beneficial to the sick person's salvation. If necessary, the sacrament also provides the sick person with the forgiveness of sins and the completion of Christian penance" (P.C., 6). The priorities are noteworthy: the foremost effect attributed to the sacrament is the salvation of the whole person in the midst of the challenge to faith and to hope posed by the experience of sickness. The focus of the sacrament appears to be on sustaining the person in the midst of illness, however brief that might be in an emergency situation, rather than on preparing the person for certain death. Both physical cure and the forgiveness of sins are secondary effects contingent upon the need of the recipient. Popular efforts to identify the sacrament's healing effect exclusively as bodily recovery or cure of the sinful soul in preparation for death founder upon the holistic vision of this text.

However, between 1973 and 1982, many pastoral decisions concerning the proper recipient of the sacrament seem to have been based upon one of these two popular theologies, as attested by experience, by the periodical literature of those years, and, finally, by the significant revisions made in the 1982 ritual. The 1973 text specified that the subject of the anointing is "those who are dangerously ill due to sickness or old age," but cautioned against scrupulosity in determining the seriousness of the illness (8). In fact, the general tenor of the rite's pastoral prescriptions was to make the sacrament more accessible than it had been previously. The rite recommended the anointing of dangerously ill candidates for surgery (R.A.P.C.S./P.C., 10), elderly persons "if they are in weak condition although no dangerous illness is present" (R.A.P.C.S./P.C., 11), and sick children "if they have sufficient use of reason to be comforted by this sacrament" (R.A.P.C.S./P.C., 12). Moreover, the sacrament could be repeated in case of a new need (R.A.P.C.S./P.C., 9). However, although retaining the notion of mortal illness as a condition for anointing, the text does take a fairly clear stance against using the sacrament as immediate preparation for death. In fidelity to the position taken by Vatican II, and, indeed, supported by the theology articulated in R.A.P.C.S./P.C., 6, quoted above in its 1982 translation, the rite not only discourages delaying the celebration of the sacrament until the moment of death (R.A.P.C.S./P.C., 13) but, in fact, forbids the anointing of even the recently dead unless there is sufficient doubt of death to permit a conditional anointing (R.A.P.C.S./P.C., 15). It does permit the anointing of an unconscious or demented person "if, as Christian believers, they would have asked for it were they in control of their faculties" (R.A.P.C.S./P.C., 14). The ritual reiterated the traditional understanding of viaticum as the sacrament for the dying, an understanding enshrined among the so-called precepts of the church, one of which was that the dying Catholic must seek to receive holy communion (R.A.P.C.S., 27, 116; P.C., 26, 237). The precept does not mention anointing. Nevertheless, this stance is not unequivocal, perhaps because, even now, the path through illness to death follows no neat and predictable progression. Sickness may be long and slow, or short and swift to yield to death. In cases of emergency, the sick ideally receive the three sacraments, penance, anointing and viaticum. If time is short and choices must be made, anointing is to be omitted. However, if the dying person lingers after receiving viaticum, he or she is to be anointed. Moreover, if the nature of the illness prevents the person from receiving communion, he or she is to be anointed instead (R.A.P.C.S./P.C., 30).

Pastoral practice from 1973 to 1982 seems to have been equally ambivalent. On the one hand, priests continued to be called to the bedside of the dying and even of the recently dead to confer "the last rites," usually perceived popularly as the sacrament of anointing rather than of viaticum. Even eucharistic ministers now authorized to give viaticum will often say that they have never heard of or seen the rite in practice, though they are quite familiar with the anointing of the sick. On the other hand, the communal celebrations of anointing endorsed by the rite itself (R.A.P.C.S., 67; cf. P.C., 108) seem especially to have become occasions for issuing a general invitation to receive the sacrament if one felt the need for healing from any kind of physical ailment at all, however slight. Emphasis was frequently placed upon the curative properties of the sacrament, with little or no attention to its soteriological significance. The rising popularity of charismatic healing seems to have given added impetus to this trend. Moreover, it became commonplace in many communities to offer the anointing regularly, even monthly, to all of the aging, often defined as those over 65, whether or not they suffered from the "weakened condition" specified by the rite. Finally, the sacrament was frequently offered during retreats or on other occasions as a means of "healing" whatever form of suffering or loss one might be experiencing, whether or not physical illness was its cause.

Theological reflection kept pace with pastoral practice. Although some theologians continued to explore the meaning of the sacrament in relation to the dying, the majority seem to have concentrated their efforts on articulating its significance for the sick. They have employed the tools of historical research, biblical studies, sacramental theology, theological anthropology, and ritual hermeneutics largely to affirm and amplify the holistic vision of sickness and sacramental healing found in R.A.P.C.S./P.C. itself. Despite disagreements on individual points, there seems to be some consensus that the healing offered in this sacrament, as a salvific action of Christ in the church, must be understood in terms of the soteriological needs specific to the person and community in the midst of the actual human experience of sickness. It cannot be interpreted exclusively in terms of either bodily or disembodied human reality.

P.C., both as it appeared originally in 1982 and as it was subsequently corrected in the light of later 1983 Code of Canon Law, reflects the major movements in both pastoral practice and theological reflection. In a significant departure from the 1973 text, P.C. identifies the proper subjects for anointing as "the faithful whose health is seriously impaired by sickness or old age." An accompanying footnote draws attention to the authors' explicit decision to remove the notion of danger of death from consideration with the intention of excluding two extremes in pastoral practice: the sacrament is not to be restricted to those who are dying; nor is it to be "given indiscriminately or to any person whose health is not seriously impaired." It is thus clearly identified as a sacrament for those who are wrestling with serious illness. This revision is fully consistent both with the definition of the sacrament's effects (R.A.P.C.S./P.C., 6) and with the breadth of the tradition revealed through historical studies. It is underlined by the structural decision to locate the sacrament of anointing, together with visits and communion, among the rites for the sick (Part I) and the sacrament of viaticum, together with prayers for the dying and rites for exceptional circumstances among the rites for the dying (Part II). However, as in R.A.P.C.S., the distinction is not absolute: Part II does include the continuous rite of penance, anointing and viaticum for the dying and a short rite of anointing for emergency use. Several further emendations make the sacrament still more accessible: in case of doubt concerning the adequacy of their use of reason, sick children are to be anointed (12); in case of doubt, those who appear to be dead but may still be living are to be anointed not conditionally but in the usual way (15). Perhaps more significant, the rite incorporates the decision made earlier by the U.S. bishops that the sacrament may be given to those determined to be suffering from serious mental illness (53). Given the nebulous interaction between the bodily and the spiritual dimensions of the human person in every illness, this decision frees the minister from undue scruples concerning the degree of physical disorder present in some types of psychological dysfunction, including the complex cases of substance addiction. However, it does hold open to some extent the door the ritual attempts to close when it specifies that the sacrament may not be given to those whose need for "healing" is prompted by some form of distress other than serious physical illness. Although the rite does not say so, such needs might sometimes be more appropriately met through the sacraments of eucharist or penance. Two other emendations place restrictions on the administration of the sacrament. One is quite explicit: the sacrament may not be given to "anyone who remains obdurately in open and serious sin" (15). As early as 416, Pope Innocent made clear in a letter to Decentius, Bishop of Gubbio, that the sacrament was not to be given to penitents. Still less, then, should it be given to one who had not even begun the process of sacramental reconciliation. The second emendation is less apparent. The 1973 text (8) refers to the sacrament's subjects as "those who are dangerously ill . . .," whereas the 1982 text refers to them as "those of the faithful whose health is seriously impaired . . ." Particularly when taken together with the explicit exclusion of serious public sinners, the addition of the phrase "of the faithful," a technical term referring to the baptized, suggests a desire to clarify the fact that the sacrament is reserved to those who are in full eucharistic communion with the church. This clarification, perhaps slight, seems again to echo the tradition articulated by Pope Innocent, who said that catechumens as well as penitents were ineligible to receive the anointing. Both of these emendations have obvious implications for pastoral practice.

Publication of P.C. did not, of course, place closure upon the issue of the meaning and subject of anointing. Both pastoral practice and its accompanying theological reflection continue to raise and to explore the question of the sacrament's effect and therefore its appropriate recipients.

The Minister of the Sacrament. Both R.A.P.C.S. and P.C. follow the Council of Trent in stating that "[t]he priest is the only proper minister of the anointing of the sick" (R.A.P.C.S./P.C., 16). However, both the general ecclesial climate and pastoral need have raised the issue of restoring in some form the pre-Carolingian practice of lay anointing of the sick, using oil blessed by the bishop. The restoration of the permanent diaconate has led to the proposal that deacons be permitted to anoint the sick, although there seems to be no historical evidence to support a specifically diaconal rite of anointing. The employment of lay ministers to the sick, particularly as professional chaplains, has led to a similar concern that those who actually minister regularly to the sick be allowed to anoint those in their care. The creation of special ministers of communion who give the bread/wine consecrated by a priest to the sick has suggested the similar establishment of special ministers of anointing—who would apply the oil blessed by the bishop to the sick. The growing shortage of priests has added considerable urgency to these proposals. However, the decision of the Council of Trent is held to be binding upon the present practice of the Roman church. Contemporary theologians continue to explore the issue of the historical relativity of the Tridentine position in order to assist in opening the way for a change in current discipline.

Pastoral Care of the Sick is the title both of a ritual book and of the multifaceted healing work through which the church continues to actualize the mission of Jesus Christ to establish the reign of God in a world still fragmented by sin, disease and death.

Jennifer Glen, "Rites of Healing: A Reflection in Pastoral Theology," In Alternative Futures for Worship, Vol. 7, Anointing of the Sick, ed. by Peter E. Fink, SJ (Collegeville MN: The Liturgical Press, 1987): 33-63. Jennifer Glen, "Sickness and Symbol: The Promise of the Future," Worship 54 (1980): 397-411. Gisbert Greshake, "Extreme Unction or Anointing of the Sick? A Plea for discrimination," trans. by Patrick J. Madden, Review for Religious 45 (1986): 435-451. Charles Gusmer, And You Visited Me: Sacramental Ministry to the Sick and Dying (New York: Pueblo, 1984). Adolf Knauber, Pastoral Theology of the Anointing of the Sick, trans. by Matthew J. O'Connell (Collegeville MN: The Liturgical Press, 1975). William F. Lynch, Images of Hope (Notre Dame IN: The University of Notre Dame Press, 1974). Thomas Marsh, "A Theology of Anointing the Sick," The Furrow 29 (1980): 89-101. Nathan Mitchell, Cult and Controversy: The Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass (New York: Pueblo, 1982). Claude Ortemann, Le sacrement des malades: histoire et signification (Paris: Editions du Chalet). David N. Power, "Let the Sick Man Call," Heythrop Journal 19 (1978): 256-270. Philippe Rouillard, "From Human Meal to Christian Eucharist," In Living Bread, Saving Cup, ed. by R. Kevin Seasoltz (Collegeville MN: The Liturgical Press): 126-157. Alfred C. Rush, "The Eucharist, the Sacrament of the Dying in Christian Antiquity," The Jurist 34 (1974): 10-35. Orlo Strunk, "The Human Sciences and the Experiences of Diminishment and Dissolution," In Alternative Futures for Worship, Vol. 7, Anointing of the Sick, ed. by Peter E. Fink, SJ (Collegeville MN: The Liturgical Press, 1987): 17-32. John J. Ziegler, Let Them Anoint the Sick (Collegeville MN: The Liturgical Press, 1987).

JENNIFER GLEN, C.C.V.I.

SICK, SACRAMENT OF, MINISTERS IN

In Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (P.C.), the description of those who have a ministry to the sick is a broad and comprehensive one. Before it even mentions the ministry which belongs to members of the community in faith, Pastoral Care stresses the role of doctors and other medical personnel who work to heal or alleviate the suffering of the sick. Their efforts are a fulfillment of Christ's command to visit the sick (P.C., 4), and this is the case whether or not they themselves believe in Christ: "Every scientific effort to prolong life and every act of care for the sick, on the part of any person, may be considered a preparation for the Gospel and a sharing in Christ's healing ministry" (P.C., 32). Sickness and the suffering that accompanies it are natural realities and not a form of punishment for personal sins. Such suffering is a sign of the condition of a world alienated from God's original plan for it (P.C., 2). The work of medical personnel to overcome the physical suffering that is a sign of this alienation is thus a part of God's redemptive plan, a sign of the kingdom already begun and still to be fully accomplished.

Within the community of faith, the body of Christ, whenever one member of the body suffers, all members have a share in that suffering. Such is the organic and intimate nature of membership in Christ's church (1 Cor 12:26). The disruption caused by illness and the challenge to personal and corporate faith that it can create become disruption and challenge for the community of faith. This changed situation is most deeply experienced by the members of the community whose lives are most closely bound to the sick through family ties and friendship. And it is felt by the community as a whole assembled for worship as the community realizes the absence of those separated from it by illness and prays for their healing.

Christ's own concern for the physical and spiritual good of the sick is carried on by the whole church. "This ministry is the common responsibility of all Christians, who should visit the sick, remember them in prayer, and celebrate the sacraments with them" (P.C., 43). Members of the faith community who have a particular role in this ministry of comfort are the family and friends of the sick, priests, deacons, and other ministers within the community, for example, special ministers of communion. The priest is responsible for the coordination of these various ministries and for himself visiting the sick and leading the celebration of the sacraments with them, particularly the sacrament of the anointing of the sick (P.C., 44). This vision of the ministry which the Christian community has to its sick members is significantly different from that found in the previous Roman ritual (1614). The 1614 ritual saw the care of the sick as almost exclusively the responsibility of the local pastor. Only if "legitimately impeded" from carrying out these duties could he associate other ministers with himself in this task (other priests and even lay people). Pastoral Care thus contains a broadened view of ministry and a renewed ecclesiology which find their fullest expression in the communal celebration of the new rites for the sick.

The concern of the community is first expressed in the care shown to the sick person and his or her family by neighbors and friends. They are usually the first to learn of illness and are often best placed to gauge the extent and effects on the sick and on family members. The uncertainty and fear brought about by illness are felt not only by the sick but also by the members of the family as they face the changes in family expectations and routine that sickness imposes. By their solicitude and readiness to help with the practical details of life (for example, food preparation and child care), neighbors and friends can be the first to minister on behalf of the community and can help to keep the community and its pastoral ministers informed of any changes in the family's situation.

The pastoral concern offered by the Christian community as a whole receives particular expression when it gathers as an assembly for worship. The community recalls those members who because of illness are physically unable to take part as well as family members and others who care for the sick. This intercession is particularly appropriate on the Lord's Day (P.C., 43). Through the general intercessions at Mass and the intercessions at morning prayer and evening prayer, the ministry of the whole community is brought to bear in a powerful way as it assumes its privileged role of intercession on behalf of a world replete with suffering and hungry for healing.

This pastoral solicitude receives concrete and full expression through an array of other sacramental activities suited to the circumstances of illness. This activity includes visits to the sick accompanied by prayer, communion of the sick, the sacrament of anointing, and, in the case of sick persons preparing for death, communion in the form of viaticum. Underlying these various forms of prayer and worship are several simple actions and gestures offered by the community's ministers, gestures laden with human and Christian meaning. They are the simple gestures of touching and embracing, the tracing of the sign of the cross on the forehead, the laying on of hands, and the anointing with blessed oil of the forehead and hands and, as circumstances suggest, other parts of the body, for example, the place of pain or injury (P.C., 124). Through these sacramental actions the ministers of the community express Christ's healing and strengthening presence and the solidarity of the community with those who because of illness are physically separated from full participation in its activities and worship.

In Pastoral Care of the Sick, the laying on of hands that is done in the rite of anointing, and may be done in the context of visits to the sick, as well as the anointing itself are reserved to the priest celebrant. All other sacramental gestures may appropriately be used by other pastoral ministers, who may lead the various rites for the sick with the exception of the anointing rite in its several forms, penance, and viaticum celebrated within Mass (P.C., 44).

Regardless of who the minister is, these physical and sacramental signs are offered and celebrated within a whole context of communal care and concern, and it is this lively reality that makes these moments full actions of the church by which the Lord conveys love and healing. A community that has surrounded the sick and their families with practical, pastoral solicitude, that is, the compassion of Christ, ensures that the rites which it celebrates with its sick, particularly the anointing of the sick, have their full sacramental force as moments of care and healing for those in need. The community's concern is then visibly expressed in the actual celebration of the rites through the presence and participation of members of the community. This presence helps to bring out the communal context more vividly (P.C., 33), a point given even stronger emphasis in connection with the anointing rite: "Because of its very nature as a sign, the sacrament of the anointing of the sick should be celebrated with members of the family and other representatives of the Christian community whenever possible. Then the sacrament is seen for what it is—a part of the prayer of the church and an encounter with the Lord (P.C., 99).

Among the ministers referred to in Pastoral Care in addition to priests, deacons and special ministers of communion receive consistent mention. Care of the sick has traditionally been associated with the role of the deacon, as part of the responsibility which the deacon has for the ministry of charity in the community. Special ministers of communion are given particular attention as those who can help to ensure that the sick are able to receive communion frequently, particularly on the Lord's Day, which is the community's special day to assemble for the eucharist (P.C., 73). This connection between the Sunday eucharistic assembly and its sick members is difficult to achieve regularly through the ministry of priest and deacon. Their responsibilities on the Lord's Day often prevent their giving the necessary time to visit and take communion to the sick. Special ministers of communion can become the way in which the community sustains this contact on Sunday and, if available in sufficient numbers, they can help to ensure that visits with the sick are not hurried because of the numbers to be seen. The importance of this ministry cannot be stressed too strongly: "The faithful who are ill are deprived of their rightful and accustomed place in the eucharistic community. In bringing communion to them the minister of communion represents Christ and manifests faith and charity on behalf of the whole community toward those who cannot be present at the eucharist. For the sick, the reception of communion is not only a privilege but also a sign of support and concern shown by the Christian community for its members who are ill" (P.C., 73).

The near monopoly of the priest (pastor) in ministry to the sick that is assumed in the ritual of 1614 was the result of an evolution in pastoral ministry over the course of the first millennium of Christianity. This can be illustrated by the anointing of the sick in particular. For the first 800 or so years the issue of who blessed the oil for use in anointing the sick was of greater concern than the question of who actually applied it to the sick. Historical sources indicated that the oil should be blessed by the bishop, as a sign of the unity and compassion of the whole local church in its care of the sick. The oil could then be taken home by families and applied either by a family member or by the sick themselves (see Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus of Rome, c. 215). Anointing by various members of the community was not uncommon. The oil could also be used by the presbyters or elders of the community in ministry to the sick (Jas 5:14-16), but these ministers should not be confused with the ordained clergy of today. Even at a later date when lay and presbyteral anointings were distinguished (for example, Pope Innocent I in the early 5th century and Bede in the late 7th and early 8th centuries), no particular weight was given to one over the other. The 9th century saw the beginnings of a more exclusive emphasis on priestly anointing. This coincided with a growing concern with the priestly ministry as such and with the increasing association of anointing with the practice of once-in-a-lifetime or deathbed penance. By the 12th century, sacramental anointing had come to be distinguished from other kinds of anointings of the sick as was anointing by ordained ministers from anointings by lay persons.

The historical evolution with regard to anointing of the sick is instructive of what happened to ministry to the sick as a whole. The 1614 ritual represents the eventual concentration of this once rich and active communal care of the sick in the ministry of the priest alone. Pastoral Care of the Sick opens up once again the possibility of making this ministry the active concern of the whole community. This new ritual book also can become the basis for the ongoing evolution of ministry to the sick. Because of the association of the diaconate with the church's work of charity, it would seem appropriate for the restored diaconate to have a greater role in the coordination of the various ministries to the sick. The laying on of hands, which even in visits to the sick is at present reserved to the priest, would seem a gesture that could accompany any care of the sick, whether this is done by a priest, deacon, or lay person. And the future evolution of the sacrament of anointing, now restored to its proper place as the sacrament of the sick, may well include a broader understanding of who may anoint. Historical precedent would seem to allow this to become a liturgical celebration led by a deacon, especially if that deacon has particular responsibility for the local community's ministry to the sick.

Regardless of its future, the present experience of ministry to the sick has great possibility. In Pastoral Care of the Sick the church has in its possession a worthy instrument for a full recovery of a lively and passionate care on behalf of the community of faith for those of its members who suffer from illness that prevents them taking full part in its life.

See Sick, pastoral care of the

JAMES M. SCHELLMAN

SICKNESS, CHRISTIAN VIEW OF

Most religious traditions have attempted to make sense of illness and disease. The interpretative frameworks they employ involve elements of medicine, religion and magic, and in some religions all three elements are totally intertwined. The basic question frequently dealt with is the cause of illness, though this is scarcely adequate. A theological and pastoral approach to illness cannot be reduced to questions of origin and cause; it must answer the question of the significance of illness in the economy of creation and salvation. This significance is closely tied with the meaning of suffering in human existence.

Illness is a complex reality. It is a physical, spiritual, psychological state with deep social and cultural consequences. Emphasis in the recent past has been put on the physical causes of illness and on the necessary science and technology to eradicate illness. Today, however, there is a greater awareness of the social and cultural factors affecting health and illness and a deeper understanding of the interactions of the physical and emotional.

Given the concept of health as a structural and functional wholeness, disease can be defined as the breakdown of such wholeness and integration. Illness represents a disharmony of many forces and fronts. A common denominator of serious illness is the radical disruption of one's ordinary life. Sickness modifies the ordinary patterns of women/men's existence, sets them out of the ordinary sphere of their social activities and roles, and brings about a new personal world. Such an occurrence can be accompanied by melancholy, confusion, anger, outrage, depression and a variety of other confusing feelings. The collapse of one's ordinary world often leads to passivity and a sense of helplessness.

Because religion is a basic shaper of attitudes and dispositions, Christianity as a religious tradition can profoundly inform the way believers perceive and respond to illness, and can provide a significant resource for coping with it. The relationship between the experience of illness and faith is a two-way street. If Christian faith can help form interpretations of sickness, sickness itself can alter the shape of one's faith. Severe illness often leads to questions about God and involves a re-evaluation of one's whole faith-stance.

Illness in the Hebrew Scriptures

The Christian stance towards illness has been shaped by a long faith tradition with roots in the Hebrew Scriptures. Judaism is marked by its monotheism. God is creator of everything and the existence of everything including man and woman depends totally upon God. Everything is subordinated to God, even evil forces. Furthermore, God is characterized as a God of justice and compassion, attributes revealed in God's covenantal relationship with Israel. Within that theology illness cannot be attributed to a god of evil, such as the spirit of darkness in Zoroastrianism. In Israel a close relationship exists between sin and illness: illness being God's punishment for sinfulness. In Deut 32:39, God affirms:

"I kill and I make alive; I wound and I heal." Both health and sickness are under God's control. The acknowledgement of and repentance for sin is necessary for the restoration of health (Ps 32:3-5). Sickness is finally not simply vindictive punishment, but a corrective, a possibility for spiritual growth.

Illness in the NT

In its approach to illness, the NT reflects a greater influence by Persian thought than the earlier Jewish writing. We find in the NT a certain modified dualism. Within God's creation, which is basically good, there exist certain evil powers such as Satan who insinuate evil into the world. A real struggle between such forces and God is taking place in the world.

Jesus himself, whose ministry is characterized by healing, appears to break through the understanding of illness as a consequence of sinfulness and thus posits illness in a very different light (Jn 9:31, 11:4; Lk 13:1-11). Jesus does not declare that illness contributes to one's salvation. Nor does he interpret illness as divine punishment. God does not provoke illness, either as a reprisal or to put women/men to the test. Illness is seen as going against God's compassionate love and as a contradiction to God's plan for creation.

Illness in the Church's Tradition

The development of NT material in the early church took various directions. It seems that the Alexandrian and Cappadocian Fathers, especially Basil, were the first to develop a theological doctrine of illness. Their positions were influenced by their understanding of original justice and original sin. Women and men were created to image God, a God understood as impassible and unchangeable. So whence illness? Illness can only be seen as a consequence of original sin, the product of human sinfulness.

Basil offers various reasons why Christians are affected by illness. Illness can have a corrective effect. It can be seen as punishment for sin. It can test one's faith and provide a way to develop detachment and the acceptance of death. Discerning the cause or reason for illness was important since it determined whether one should seek a possible relief from a physician. Only when sickness is the result of natural causes or as a corrective should a physician be summoned. When sickness is discerned as punishment, it should simply be accepted. Some of this understanding could still be found much later in the church. In 1829, for example, Leo XII declared, "Whoever allows himself to be vaccinated ceases to be a child of God. Smallpox is a judgement of God, the vaccination is a challenge toward heaven."

Throughout the history of Christianity there has always been a degree of tension between theology and medicine. In certain positions recourse should be to God alone since God is the source and also the healer of ills for others. In other positions physicians can be understood as God's instrument in healing the sick. Because of these differing positions, the relationship between the cure of the soul and the care of the body has often been conflictual. A canon promulgated at the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 (22 Decretales 5.38.13) affirmed the physician's obligation to call a confessor before taking care of the patient.

Following the practice recommended in Jas 5:14-16, the early church employed a ritual for physical healing which later came to be used almost exclusively as anointing for the terminally ill and as a preparation for death. Compassion for the sick found expression in other ways as well. Already in 372 we find the establishment of a charitable institution, the Basileias, which became the prototype of Christian hospitals. Gregory of Nazianzus in his panegyric on St. Basil refers to this institution as a place "where disease is regarded in a religious light . . . and sympathy put to a test" (On St. Basil, 63). St. Jerome also recounts the establishment of a hospital in Rome by a lady friend, Fabiola. He narrates how she gathered the abandoned sick and nursed them (Epistle 77.6.1-2).

Such institutions as anointing the sick and the establishment of hospitals follow Jesus' example of compassion, whose object was not only the soul but also the body. Moreover, the visitation and the care of the sick has always been encouraged and understood as a basic expression of one's love for God (Mt 25:35-40).

Christian Attitude Toward Illness

What meaning, what attitude should a Christian have towards illness? Contemporary existentialist thought has pointed out several important elements of sickness as a state of being. Sickness re-emphasizes the experience of contingency and the fragility of human existence. Sickness, with all the limitations it imposes on the body, can bring about a deeper grasp of human freedom. Recovery from sickness often entails a greater exercise of one's freedom. Every illness is a limitation upon freedom and an opportunity to transcend such limitation. While illness often tends to isolate, it also leads to a greater sense of dependence upon the "Other." The meaning of every illness is dying and in a real way every healing is resurrection. In a sense illness is always the passage point, the threshold between a dying and a living. Sickness is liminal. Sickness is the enemy of life.

The Christian response to illness is a stance of acceptance and of refusal. Acceptance is necessary since illness is the consequence of our finitude and the precariousness of our existence. Refusal is also necessary, for sickness, which is a negative element in life, is often an impediment to human development, weakening one's capacity for spiritual development and self-understanding.

Pastoral Approaches

Conflicting views on the cause, nature and meaning of illness have made a pastoral approach to illness difficult. In the medical approach, there is more focus on the illness than on the ill person. In the religious approach, in contrast, there is more attention given to the afflicted person than to the affliction. A holistic pastoral approach would have to pay attention to both the illness and the person.

Many contemporary illnesses such as hypertension, cancer and AIDS do not easily lend themselves to one single pastoral approach. These illnesses are deeply related to stress, to lifestyles and to relationships. Illness itself affects a person's relationships, to God, to oneself, and to one's family and friends. In many cases sickness is correlative to sin, not in the sense that it is sent upon an individual as punishment, but as a result of personal decision or action. The etiology of many diseases can be directly related to the lifestyle individuals have created for themselves. There is clearly personal responsibility and possible guilt. A pastoral approach to illness must recognize the tendency of afflicted persons either to perceive their sickness as punishment or to excuse themselves completely from responsibility. Furthermore a pastoral approach must recognize the need to emphasize Jesus' attitude toward the sick. To exhort a sick person to offer her/his suffering to God would imply that there is some virtue in remaining unwell. Jesus never questions the afflicted person's desire for healing. He in fact encourages it. Illness is not meant of itself to "sanctify" us or to test our faith. It serves to invite us into the mystery of God's own suffering. What the paschal mystery reveals to us is not the necessity of suffering for salvation, but the great truth that, although sickness tends to isolate us and cause us to withdraw, God is our companion, a fellow-sufferer with us.

See Suffering; Healing

Jack Harold Kahn, Job's Illness: Loss, Grief and Integration, a Psychological Interpretation (New York: Pergamon Press, 1975). L. Bowman, The Importance of Being Sick (Wilmington: Consortium Books, 1976). Susan Sontag, Illness As Metaphor (New York: Farrar, Strauss and Giroux, 1978). Daniel Berrigan, We Die Before We Live: Talking With the Very Ill (New York: Seabury, 1980). Norman Cousins, Anatomy of Illness As Perceived by the Patient (Toronto: Bantam Books, 1981). Joseph H. Fichter, S.J., Religion and Pain (New York: Crossroad, 1981). B.M. Sourkes, Psychological Aspects of Life-Threatening Illness (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1982). J.L. Empereur, Prophetic Anointing: God's Call to the Sick, the Elderly and the Dying (Wilmington, Delaware: Glazier, 1982). Gerald May, Addiction and Grace (San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1988). David Power, "Let the Sick Man Call," The Heythrop Journal 9 (July 1978): 256-270. Jennifer M. Glen, "Sickness and Symbol: The Promise of the Future," Worship 54 (November 1980): 397-411.

LUCIEN J. RICHARD, O.M.I.

SILENCE, LITURGICAL ROLE OF

In addition to the symbols, words, gestures, and music which together constitute the liturgy, there is silence, a vital dimension of liturgical prayer. In the context of the liturgy, silence may be viewed as an activity of the gathered assembly. It is an expression of the assembly's corporate attentiveness to the word of God proclaimed in the scriptures, and of its receptivity to the Spirit present in the celebration of Christ's mysteries in memory and in hope. The role of silence in the liturgy is not properly understood as an occasion for members of the assembly to engage in private, mental prayer, or to practice meditation undistracted by the liturgical action. Rather, when liturgy is viewed as a community's response to the divine initiative in word and sacrament, silence is understood as that dimension which enables the person and community to be brought more fully into the mystery of Christ's presence celebrated in liturgy.

Silence is a necessary dimension of all liturgical activity. The Foreword to the American edition of the Sacramentary draws attention to the importance of silence for eucharistic worship, but what is said of silence has implications for all liturgical celebration. "The proper use of periods of silent prayer and reflection will help render the celebration less mechanical and impersonal and lend a more prayerful spirit to the liturgical rite. Just as there should be no celebration without song, so too there should be no celebration without periods for silent prayer and reflection" (p. 13).

Similarly, the significance of silence for all liturgical activity is brought to the fore in the General Instruction of the Liturgy of the Hours. Care should be taken in liturgical services to assure that "at the proper times all observe a reverent silence" (201). Silence is also suggested so that those at prayer might receive in their hearts "the full sound of the voice of the Holy Spirit" and unite their prayer to the word of God and to the prayer of the whole church (202). To this end, intervals of silence are placed after the recitation of the psalms and concluded with psalm prayers. Silence also follows the readings during the liturgy of the hours.

Historically, the role of silence in the eucharistic liturgy may be viewed from three perspectives. First, there are those periods of silence which are intrinsic to the liturgy itself. Second, there are the silent, or barely audible, prayers of private devotion said by the presiding minister. Finally, there is the silent recitation by the presiding minister of those prayers properly said aloud, or at least intended to be said aloud at their inception.

This last form of silent prayer is found in some of the historic liturgies in which major parts of the eucharistic prayer were recited in silence. This was linked to the notion that the priest alone entered and celebrated the awesome mystery of sacrifice.

As for the second form, during the later Middle Ages, priests were furnished with private prayers to be said silently at certain parts of the Mass, and some of the public prayers began to be said secretly. All of this was connected with the developing notion of the priest's role in offering the sacrifice and celebrating the mysteries. Very few of these silent prayers remain for the presiding minister in today's liturgy because it was recognized that the recitation of such prayers tended to separate his action from the action of the assembly.

As an integral dimension of the eucharistic liturgy, silence disposes an assembly to listen attentively in response to the divine initiative. The General Instruction of the Roman Missal (esp. 9, 12, 55) underscores the importance of listening in silent attention as a vital form of liturgical participation. Both the proclamation of the word and the recitation of the presidential prayers are expressive of the "dialogical" character of liturgy, calling for the undivided attention of the assembly and its wholehearted response at their conclusion.

The revised Roman Missal either prescribes or suggests the following among various times for silent prayer: before the blessing of water or the penitential rite during the introductory rites; after the invitation to pray (oremus), before continuing with the opening prayer; after the readings and homily; after communion; and again, unless silence has already been observed after communion, between the invitation to pray (oremus) and the post-communion prayer.

Silence need not be restricted to these regular and customary times. It may be useful to note briefly that the practice of silent prayer before and after the liturgy increased during those periods of history when times of silence integral to the liturgy waned. This would seem to warrant due attention to the role of silence as an intrinsic dimension of liturgy alongside symbol, word, gesture and music in appropriating the fullness of Christ's mysteries celebrated in liturgy.

Kevin W. Irwin, "Liturgy: An Experience of Prayer," Liturgy, Prayer and Spirituality (New York: Paulist, 1984): 249-276. Cyprian Vagaggini, Theological Dimensions of the Liturgy (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1976), using the analytical index under "Silence." "Foreword," Sacramentary (New York: Catholic Book Publishing Company, 1974). "General Instruction of the Liturgy of the Hours," and "General Instruction of the Roman Missal," in Documents on the Liturgy, 1963-1979: Conciliar, Papal, and Curial Texts (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1982).

MICHAEL DOWNEY

SIN, EXPERIENCE OF

The concept of sin is central to Christian faith. The gospels present the good news of Christ as victory over sin, and the freedom he brings as the forgiveness of sin. Christian liturgy uses symbols indicating faith in the forgiveness of sin, provides texts for the celebration of this belief, and frequently refers to the many and varied forms that sin takes in human life. Without a consciousness of sin, we cannot make sense of the penitential aspect of many liturgical celebrations. At the high point of the eucharist we are reminded that the blood of Christ is shed "so that sins may be forgiven." Sin is one of the basic words of Christian tradition, as fundamental as "grace" or God. In fact, what really distinguishes Christianity is its attitude to sin, and this has been an important element in the evangelizing force of the Christian message, which not only preaches repentance but promises forgiveness even of the greatest faults.

Sin is essentially the free and deliberate disobedience of a creature to the known will of God. It is primarily a religious and theological reality, a symbol which expresses our alienation from God. Though it involves moral fault and moral evil, it is much more. It is a mysterious phenomenon whose roots escape human understanding. As the total Christian vision gives meaning to the mystery of the world and human life, sin is the symbol which expresses the darker side of our relationship with God. As symbol it was subject to historical and cultural development, from biblical times to the present day, but theological reflection has added little of substance to what is implicit in the NT.

In the early centuries the understanding of sin was affected by the practice of public penance, then later by feudal notions, and from the 12th century onwards by the organization of confessional practice and the elaboration of a corpus of moral theology concerned with law and measurement. Freudian psychology in its earlier years was used to explain sin in non-moral terms, and the secularizing forces of recent decades made sin problematic, if not archaic, by removing it from its religious context and depriving it of its central meaning. For Catholics, the more positive approach to worldly realities espoused by the Second Vatican Council, and a reaction against the church's traditional "sin-grid" led to a marked decline in confessional practice and some confusion in the understanding of sin. But the recognition of demonic forces in contemporary civilization has led to a new emphasis on the reality of sin, and theologians are now trying to make the symbol come alive in ways that will make sense in today's world.

Biblical Background. Any new understanding of the concept, however, must be rooted in its biblical background, because sin is a religious dimension before being ethical. King David's sins of adultery and murder were certainly against a fellow human being and the order of society, but in the moment of conversion he acknowledged them as sins against God. The psalmist goes to the heart of the matter when he exclaims to God: "Against you, you only, have I sinned and done what is evil" (Ps 51:4).

There is no special word in Hebrew for the theological notion of sin, but the OT uses different words to describe what the Jewish people understood by sin. The most common is the verb meaning "to miss the mark," not simply a mistake in judgment, but a failure to reach a goal, and this could be a non-action, an omission. Other words used were iniquity, guilt, rebellion, disorder, abomination, lie, folly. From the contexts in which these words appear it is clear that sin was not simply the transgression of a law, but actually caused a break in the relationship between God and his people. Israel understood this relationship as a covenant, alliance or pact of love, initiated by God himself. Because of this special choice of God, they were his people and were expected to act as the people of God. The laws they devised for their conduct and for the ordering of their society, whether discovered by their own experience or borrowed from the surrounding peoples, were understood as the laws of God, coming from God himself. They were the path he meant them to follow if they were to become the holy people he wanted them to be. Failure to observe them meant to miss the mark of God's love. It meant iniquity, a deviation from how things ought to be, and this meant guilt, the distortion produced by sin, the state of being divided from one's better self, from one's environment and neighbors, and most of all from God. Guilt was thought of as a burden too heavy to bear, a rust that eats into a person's soul and remains engraved on the sinner's heart.

The description of sin as rebellion is not to be understood in terms of today's political relationships. In the ancient world the relationship between sovereign and servant was one of beneficence, so rebellion was ingratitude and personal insult, much like the rebellion of a child against the goodness of its parents. When sin is described as folly, this is not to imply diminished responsibility, but to indicate that the sinner becomes foolish by his sin.

But the basic notion of sin throughout the OT is that of a break in the relationship between God and human beings. This relationship is not primarily between creator and creature, but that between the divine and human partners in a personal union, a mutual relationship of belonging. Israel actually experienced the ever-present love of God through the long years of its history, and in that sense knew God, as a wife knows her husband and is known by him. God speaks through Jeremiah with all the heartbreak of a deserted husband: "My people, why do you turn away from me without ever turning back? I listened carefully, and you did not speak the truth. Not one of you has been sorry for his wickedness. . . . Everyone keeps on going his own way. . . . You do not know the laws by which I rule you" (Jer 8:5-7).

This background is taken for granted by the NT writers, but they added new elements: that sin is not only an individual act, but also a state or condition, that it is a power at work in the world, but it is finally overcome by Jesus. In the Synoptics Jesus does not speak directly about sin, but he was conscious of its reality and in his actions showed he could conquer sin and death. His mission was to be with sinners, to bring them forgiveness, and with them he accepted the closest fellowship known to the oriental world, i.e., table fellowship. He drew sinners into fellowship with himself and restored them to fellowship with God.

In the writings of John, sin is described as lawlessness, unrighteousness. The one who sins is from the devil and is the slave of sin. Sin is the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life. The sinner loves darkness more than the light. More often than not, John uses the word sin to describe a state rather than a single act.

The fullest theology of sin is to be found in the Pauline letters, where the word occurs sixty times. For Paul, sin is universal, something in which every human being is involved. It is first and foremost a state or condition of human nature from which sinful acts come. It is a power which has us in its grip, so that we are "under sin" in the same way that a child is said to be under its parents. Sin "takes us captives" as prisoners are taken in war. It is not merely an external power, but gets right inside us, into our every fibre, so that we become the "slaves of sin." But Paul also affirms our freedom in the face of sin. We can resist and overcome it by Christ dwelling in our hearts, by his spirit taking possession of us (Rom 8:1-17).

Original Sin. The NT speaks of the consequence of sin. Sin results in a hardening of the heart, a dulling of the moral sense, so that there is less and less reluctance to sin, and thus sin begets sins. It also results in "death," because sin is the denial of life, and the sinner dies to his better, potential self each time he sins. Because of the relation between sin and death, Paul argues from the universality of death to the universality of sin (Rom 5:12-21). Because all must die, all are sinners, even though they have not sinned personally. He uses this condition of sin and death as a foil to emphasize the new life brought by Christ. In developing the parallel between Christ and Adam he traces our sinful condition to the sin of the first humans as its historical origin. Because of his belief in the universality of grace through Christ, Paul makes much of the sinful condition in which all of us find ourselves even before and apart from any personal sin. This is the basis for what later theology and church teaching came to describe as original sin. Traditionally this means the sinful condition brought about as a result of the "original" or first sin of the first humans, as portrayed in Genesis, chap. 3.

Fifteen centuries of tradition accepted the Genesis story as an historical account of the primal sin which gave rise to the sinfulness passed on genetically to all of Adam's descendants. This tradition implies an historic "fall" of humans from an idyllic state at the dawn of history. It can also give the impression that the incarnation and redemption were a kind of back-up plan devised by God to overcome the "happy fault" (Adam's sin) which occasioned them. But the picture of an historical state of perfection in which the first humans were tested and found wanting, with catastrophic results for their descendants, has lost its credibility for us. Theologians who in recent decades have turned amateur scientists to harmonize scripture and science have been less than convincing. Science has little to say that would throw light on the theological understanding of the reality we refer to as original sin.

Almost all scholars admit that the third chapter of Genesis tells us nothing about what happened at the beginning of time, but that it is a story to explain what is happening all of the time. Instead of describing an historical first sin, it presents an ingeniously simple picture of what every sin really is: human self-assertion of those who want to be God, who want to go their own way in deciding what is right and wrong. It is more than a simple act of disobedience. Deep inner processes are involved, as indicated by the expression "being as God" and "knowledge of good and evil." The root of sinful action is to be found in the arrogance of human freedom. The paradise story describes God's plan for all people. He created us "in his own image and likeness," and we are most like him in our freedom. He shares with us his "dominion over all the creatures of the earth." He invites us to intimacy with him, wishes to treat us as friends who "walk with him in the garden." But we cannot be satisfied simply to accept his goodness. We want to be like him in deciding for ourselves what is good or evil. The one thing we cannot have, to be gods, is the one thing we want. This is the essence of all sin, to put self before God, to want something which is not ours, to want it so much that we ignore the consequences to ourselves or others. This, of course, is deception. We are blinded by our selfishness, and it is only afterwards our eyes are opened, we discover that we are naked, and have to hide from God and from each other. Not only have we turned from God, but we are no longer at peace with ourselves; we are at odds with our neighbors and even the material world itself seems to turn sour on us; what was meant to be our garden becomes a hostile environment. We do not wish to be called to account by God, and when we cannot avoid it we resort to excuses and rationalizations. The story is not of a primeval event beyond normal experience, but a true-to-life description of the psychology of all sin. All humans would behave in the same way if placed in similar circumstances.

The Genesis account paints a telling picture of the psychological process we call sin, but in its context it is also a symbol of the existential situation of the human race in the totality of its sinfulness. While the scriptures identify individual sins of persons and groups, they also speak of sin in the singular as a state or condition of humankind as a whole, as an evil power at work in the world. John the Baptist pointed to Jesus as the Lamb who takes away the sin of the world, as the one who not only brings forgiveness of individual sins, but conquers sin in its very root. The sinful condition we recognize in the world must have had an historical beginning, but we have no details about what it was or when it occurred. What we do believe is that it grew and developed as a power so that it is now inexorably mingled with our culture and social structures; it even affects our physical and psychological prenatal existence. The drug addiction or depression of an expectant mother can affect the future of her unborn child, and a person born into a racist society will have difficulty in recognizing and responding to values like equality and respect for all persons. Our joining the human race involves us in an environment of sin before we ever become capable of personally contributing to it. The situation is well described by Monika Hellwig: "Sin has become the condition of human life in history. The consequences of evil deeds haunt us down the centuries with their reverberating echoes. They become hardened into standard expectations and patterns of behavior, into the structures of society that are seen as the guarantees of the good. Sin incarnates itself in every kind of violence and compulsion and disguises itself under the masks of law and order in society—ways of stabilizing and maintaining oppressive power and privilege for those who already possess it. Sin expresses itself in fears and suspicion and hatred ill-disguised. It leaves its deposits in prejudices, rivalries, quest of security in the hoarding of goods and the claiming of privilege to the disadvantage of others. It emerges constantly in an irrational lust for power to compel other human beings and shape the world to one's own imaginings" (Jesus, the Compassion of God, Michael Glazier, 1983, p. 98).

This description, however, does not mean that original sin is nothing more than the sin of the world which affects us as environment. If we describe original sin simply in terms of exposure to the sin of the world, we are not faithful to the teaching of Trent, which speaks of our intrinsic, natural predisposition to sin even before we are exposed to any sinful social influences. It is true that the Council of Trent took a literal view of Genesis and was unaware of modern views on the origin of the human species, but we have to respect the essential teaching which transcends the cultural background of Trent. The core of doctrine defined by the council may be expressed in three basic assertions: that Christ is central to the whole plan of creation, revelation and redemption; that every human being is in need of the redemption won by Christ; and that this need is antecedent to the commission of personal sin or exposure to sinful environment. Karl Rahner reminds us that such notions as "redemption," the "need for redemption," "salvation" and "deliverance from evil" are theological terms and should not be connected in a temporal sequence. He also stresses that the idea of the first sin of the first human person (or persons) being transmitted to us biologically has absolutely nothing to do with the Christian dogma of original sin (Foundations of Christian Faith, pp. 90, 110). The essential meaning of original sin is that every human being begins life in a state of alienation from God insofar as without grace we will be unable to rise to the level of existence God had planned for us. Even with grace we will continually fail, because we are free and grace will always respect our freedom. There is a deep mystery in the interplay between divine omnipotence and human freedom, and the further mystery that God creates us imperfect although his plan is that we, under grace, will freely grow into the fullness of the maturity of Christ. There is no personal guilt in being born into the state of "original sin," yet humankind brought it on itself by going against God's plan through deliberate wrong choices, and the whole human race is continually involved in sin.

The new rite of baptism no longer emphasizes liberation from original sin as the primary purpose and effect of the sacrament, but initiation into the Christian community, incorporation into the body of Christ. Being introduced into the mystery of Christ's death and resurrection involves forgiveness of sin, but the primary emphasis is on the new life of grace which, of course, empowers the baptized person to conquer evil and sin.

Actual Sin. The mystery of original sin transcends time and space, and in that context the passage from sin to grace is not a temporal, before-and-after one. Only the present continuous tense is adequate to express what is happening in this mystery of creation and redemption. But the sins we personally commit by our failure to respond to grace do take place in time and history, and tradition refers to them as actual sins. Original sin is original in the sense of being basic, fundamental, the root of all sin, but not necessarily in the sense of temporal priority. It is called sin only by analogy, because it does not involve personal guilt. But its effect is to leave us prone to personal sin. Because grace respects and does not block our freedom, we can still say "no" to God's plan in the details of our lives. Indeed, it may be said that, statistically, sin is normal.

The early Christians soon discovered that in spite of their new life in Christ, they were subject to temptation and sin, so there was need for repentance and continual conversion. They needed to be helped too by identifying the activities to be avoided as sinful. The OT has several catalogues of sins (Deut 27:15-26; Amos 2:4-8, 8:4-6; Hos 4:2; Ezek 18:5-20). Jesus himself gives an abbreviated version of the Decalogue (Mk 10:18-19) and gives further examples of sinful behavior in his description of the last judgment (Mt 25:41-46). There are several lists of sinful activities in the rest of the NT: 1 Cor 6:9-10; Gal 5:19-21; Rom 1:24-32; 1 Tm 1:4-11; 1 Pet 4:2-5; 2 Pet 2:12-22. The people of God have always been conscious of degrees of seriousness in sin, but the gradation was differently understood at different times.

Mortal and Venial Sin. The modern division of sins into mortal and venial is not to be found as such in scripture or in the early church, but was conditioned by the church's later legislation about confession. St. John distinguishes degrees of sin in his first letter: "If you see your brother commit a sin that does not lead to death, you should pray to God, who will give him life. This applies to those whose sins do not lead to death. But there is a sin which leads to death, and I do not say that you should pray to God about that. All wrongdoing is sin, but there is sin which does not lead to death" (1 Jn 5:16-17). It is not clear what precisely is the sin that leads to death, or the "deadly sin." In the context, it probably refers to the "sin against the Holy Spirit," final impenitence, the attitude of the person who simply refuses forgiveness and is impervious to the power of prayer (Mt 12:21-32; Mk 3:28-30; Lk 12:10).

This reference to "attitude" recalls an important element in the biblical notion of sin. Though OT and NT make clear that individual actions can be sinful, the emphasis is more on sin as a basic attitude, a state of sinfulness. In his various catalogues, Paul was not so much listing sins as describing the kind of people who exclude themselves from the kingdom of heaven by their way of life. The sinful attitude, of course, is built up by individual actions, as James writes: "A person is tempted when he is drawn away and trapped by his own evil desire. Then his evil desire conceives and gives birth to sin; and sin, when it is full-grown, gives birth to death" (1:14-15). John too speaks more of sin as a state than of individual sinful actions. To emphasize the seriousness of the sinful state he quotes Jesus at the Last Supper: "Whoever hates me hates my Father also" (Jn 15:23). This is the origin of our notion of mortal sin or sinfulness, namely a state of mind and will, a way of life amounting to a total rejection of God, a condition of total selfishness. Nowhere in the NT do we get a list of individual mortal sins meriting the punishment of hell or needing confession and special absolution, but the various sin-lists are warnings and indications as to the kind of behavior that can lead to the state of mortal sinfulness, spiritual death.

In the early church the more serious sins brought excommunication (1 Cor 5:3-11). The sinner was excluded from the community and shunned by fellow-believers, both to shock the sinner into repentance and to protect the community from the contagion of sinfulness. Such sins were called crimes, grave sins, capital sins, and the main ones were idolatry, apostasy, murder, abortion and publicly-known adulterous relationships. For centuries the excommunicated sinner could be re-admitted only once in a lifetime, but gradually re-admission became more frequent and the list of "grave sins" became more extensive, including even internal sins. The final phase of this development came when the Council of Trent decreed that penitents were to confess all mortal sins according to number and kind.

The decree did not specify what constituted mortal sin, but theologians had already begun to define mortal and venial sins. Mortal sin was a serious act of immorality carried out with full knowledge and full consent, whereas venial sin was present when the matter was light or there was not full knowledge or full consent. Mortal sin involved a total break in the relationship with God, a total loss of divine grace, hence spiritual death, whereas venial sin involved some moral disorder, but did not destroy the life of grace. To die in the state of mortal sinfulness meant the loss of God, eternal damnation.

Fundamental Option. This clearcut division was the common currency of the church's teaching and pastoral practice for centuries. But it has been seriously questioned in recent times and a number of theologians prefer a threefold division, namely: (1) mortal sinfulness, (2) serious or grave sin, and (3) less serious or venial sin, the daily faults of the normally good person. They use the term "mortal sinfulness" in the biblical sense explained above to describe the state of one whose basic stance is total selfishness, such that there is no room for any reference to God or consideration of others. Such a stance may come about as a result of a serious immoral action, but it involves something deeper than a single decision, action or omission. It involves a person's basic attitude to life, to others, to the world, and in and through all of this, to God. It involves a person's moral identity as a person, the kind of person he or she has become through free decisions and actions. Common human experience as well as the insights of modern psychology suggest that our moral identity (basic goodness or badness) at this deep level does not change back and forth quickly or frequently. A person's basic goodness may persist in spite of occasional actions that seem to conflict with it. Such actions could be considered "serious" sins, but without the malice and the serious consequences associated with mortal or lethal sin. Church discipline may well decree that they be submitted to sacramental confession for forgiveness, but they would not automatically destroy one's basic outlook, attitude and general moral goodness.

This newer approach rejects the simple notion of mortal sin being defined in terms of knowledge, freedom and serious matter. It is not the gravity of the matter that makes a particular sin mortal, but rather the degree to which the individual is personally involved, the degree to which the action flows from the core of the person. If the totality of the person is not involved, then even serious matter does not automatically change the person's basic moral stance. Contemporary theologians speak of fundamental option to describe this level of moral responsibility. Categorical or ordinary freedom is exercised in ordinary free decisions and actions, but fundamental freedom is involved when it is a question of the disposition of the whole person to God, when one's whole pattern of life is either in line with God's will and the true human good, or in opposition to this.

This fundamental option, basic choice, or general life-direction (for or against God) flows from the core of our personality and determines the overall pattern of our lives. But not all our decisions and actions come from the center of our person. Many of our actions are at the periphery. They come from instinctual drives, both positive and negative, such as the sexual urge, aggressiveness, fear, insecurity, all of which obscure our insight, or from routine, so that our full freedom is not involved. Such actions may be in line with our basic option, perhaps strengthening it, or they may be inconsistent with it and so weaken it, though not central enough to change it.

It is clear that mortal sinfulness in the biblical sense of spiritual death is not present except in the case of central acts coming from the core of our personality, acts which change our basic attitude away from God. The change need not be a dramatic one concentrated in a single act, but the end result of a continued pattern of selfish living until we arrive at a state where we discover that God has been excluded from our lives. Human life, however, is seldom a clearcut, black-and-white picture, so we cannot be certain where we stand in God's eyes. Only God himself knows: "I, the Lord, search the minds and test the hearts of men. I treat each one according to the way he lives, according to what he does" (Jer 17:10). Thomas Aquinas reminds us that we can never have more than a moral certainty that we are in the state of grace. Christian realism demands that we accept this uncertainty and learn to live creatively with it.

The uncertainty applies not only to our basic option, but at times even to individual sinful actions. Such is the basic imperfection of our human nature, the influence of subconscious factors, the weight of external pressures from the sinful world around us, and the gradual and groping development of our freedom and moral insight, that we can seldom be sure that a particular action is central, that it flows from the core of our person and the depth of our conscience. However, the sin-lists of scripture and church teaching are intended to indicate that certain actions are so serious in their consequences that a morally developed person performing them could normally presume that they came from the center of the person and not from the periphery. A person could well have a moral certainty that such is the case, but no one is ever justified in judging someone else is in mortal sin; only God knows. In fact, actions in themselves are not sins, no matter how serious; sin applies only to persons.

Other dimensions. Christian tradition has never seen sin as a purely private affair affecting only the sinner and God. Every sin has a social dimension. Even the most private sins affect the holiness of the body of Christ. In some sins forgiveness requires making restitution. In the sacrament of reconciliation the priest represents both God and the community. But the tradition paid little attention to collective sin and collective guilt; in this context we think of phenomena like Naziism. This is more than just the social repercussion of individual sin.

But there is a still further kind of sin. Personal and communal sins affect the area of primary relationships between people, but social or societal sins are in the more complex, impersonal, structural level of secondary relationships. The 1971 Roman Synod of Bishops spoke of "sin both of individuals and of society as a whole," without explaining the relationship between them. But the Latin American bishops in their Puebla document emphasized social sin as "the objectification of sin in the economic, social, political and ideological-cultural field" (Puebla, 1113). They pointed out that sin affects entire systems, such as Marxism and liberal capitalism (P., 92) and can even affect culture (P., 405). The apostolic exhortation Reconciliatio et Paenitentia of John Paul II (1984) speaks very strongly of social sin.

Social sin has existed since humankind moved from the simple primary relationships of individuals and a few families to the more complex structure of organized society. But we are more aware of this kind of sin since the social sciences have shown us that hunger, poverty and misery do not "just happen," but are the result of socio-economic and political relationships. The root of this sin is selfishness and the arrogance of power, but it is also an evil which exists almost independently of individual conscience and which imposes itself on that conscience.

The Christian community can feel helpless in the face of such sinful structures, but it needs to acknowledge them. In 1969 the bishops of Peru acknowledged that "we as Christians through inadequate loyalty to the gospel have contributed to the present situation of injustice with our words, attitudes, omissions and silence." We need to repent of such sins, to ask forgiveness of God for them. The communal celebration of the liturgy of reconciliation can be most helpful here, allowing people to put this sinfulness before God, in repentance, whereas a private confession would feel unreal since it is so hard to measure our individual responsibility for social sin. Such celebrations help to create a community of conversion, in which individuals begin to realize that conversion of heart and improvement of social structures belong together. Salvation from sin means more than the acknowledgement of guilt; it includes the dismantling of the sinful system and the removal of suffering and its causes. As the Pueblo document states: "the transformation of structures is an external expression of inward conversion" (P., 1221). To change sinful structures requires concerted effort on the part of Christians, but to discern the appropriate action calls for an understanding of how those structures function. A thorough knowledge of the social sciences is needed here. This is a new challenge to the church's penitential practice, going beyond, though not replacing, the traditional prayer, fasting and almsgiving.

The complexity and insidious pervasiveness of social sin remind us of the scriptural description of sin as an evil power at work in the world. It is a frightening reality, but Paul reminds us of our Christian belief that "where sin increased, grace increased much more" (Rom 5:20). In Christ Jesus we have the forgiveness of all sin. No matter how great or how powerful, evil does not have the last word.

G. Berkouwer, Sin (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1971). S. Fagan, Has Sin Changed? (Wilmington: Glazier, 1988). J. Gaffney, Sin Reconsidered (Ramsey, NJ: Paulist, 1983). B. Häring, Sin in the Secular Age (Garden City: Doubleday, 1974). P. Schoonenberg, Man and Sin (London: Sheed and Ward, 1966).

SEÁN FAGAN, S.M.

SOCIAL ISSUES, LITURGY AND

The relationship between liturgy and social issues is ecclesiological in nature and has important theological and pastoral aspects. At issue is the liturgy's function in the church and the church's mission in the world. There will always be some relationship between liturgy and mission, but its nature and content will reflect what the liturgy does and is expected to do in the life of the church. It will also depend on how moral obligation is conceived, particularly with respect to interventions in political and social affairs. Because important developments in these areas are underway, the relationship between liturgy and social issues continues to evolve.

The church has certainly recognized human distress and the many serious problems in the human community. Its liturgical life has been shaped in part as a response to them. Baptism, for example, confronts sin and alienation in human life and reconciles people to God and the church. The sacramentary used at Mass provides prayers for such intentions as the unity of Christians, peace and justice, refugees and exiles, and relief from famine. The sacrament of penance testifies to the church's continuing struggle against sin in its own members and its commitment to forgive offenses and support personal conversion. On all occasions the liturgy calls people to holiness and reminds them of their obligation to practice justice and live in charity with all.

Another facet of the church's response is its official statements on social and political issues. These statements deal with a wide range of local, national, and international problems, considering them theoretically as well as concretely. Especially since Pope Leo XIII's encyclical Rerum Novarum issued in 1891, a large and significant body of literature has accumulated. These interventions manifest the seriousness with which Catholic leaders have taken contemporary social and political problems.

Although the popes and other church leaders invariably acknowledged faith in God the creator and fidelity to the gospel, they often de-emphasized religious arguments in addressing social issues. Because they were speaking to a wide secular audience, they tried instead to base their case on a human nature common to all and knowable by all. In light of a natural order linked to human nature, certain essential relationships among individuals and groups in society were discerned, and a series of mutual rights and obligations elaborated (e.g., John XXIII, Pacem in Terris, 3-7). This approach, which reflects the moral theology of the time, shows that the church was trying to be specific and reasonable in promoting justice and peace in social life.

The liturgy's promotion of justice, charity, and peace through prayer and personal conversion is appropriate and helpful. When these mainly transcendent and private dynamics predominate, however, they can eclipse the historical and public dimensions that are also proper to liturgy. It then becomes more difficult for worshippers to see how the liturgy relates to the corporate life of the church or an active ministry in a world inherently social and political. A tendency to disassociate this kind of social engagement from the liturgy is reinforced by the natural law argumentation often found in official statements. Despite their merits, these abstract and deductive arguments usually fail to persuade those who are not sympathetic to begin with. Moreover, because this approach appears tangential to the church's faith and worship, some have felt justified in questioning the substance of official social teachings and the legitimacy of church involvement in social and political affairs (G.S., 43).

A different relationship emerges when liturgy and engagement with the world are renewed by contact with the sources proper to them. In this regard one of the most important developments has been the biblical renewal. Underway since the latter part of the 19th century, this renewal culminated in the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation. The church now appreciates better the primacy of God's word for its entire life (D.V., 21). The sacred scriptures proclaim God's mighty deeds in human history and testify that God spoke to the human family first through the prophets and finally through his son, Jesus Christ (Heb 1:1-2). God's word calls the church to a response that is personal, total, and unreserved (D.V., 5). The scriptures furthermore show the centrality of the New Covenant in the blood of Christ for the life of the church (Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:23-29; L.G., 9). The covenant is fundamental because it locates our relationship with God and gives it an inescapably ecclesial quality.

Building on the biblical renewal, the Second Vatican Council instituted a major reform of the Roman liturgy. God's word now has a position of paramount importance in all sacramental celebrations (S.C., 24). Not only is the word proclaimed more generously in the various liturgies, but the word makes the Lord present to the assembly and manifests the primacy of the Lord in the church, its life, and its worship (S.C., 7, 35).

The presence of the Lord by means of word and sign is essential to the liturgical event. The Lord engages the church and makes it present and active as well (S.C., 7). The liturgy is therefore an essentially ecclesial activity; individuals participate as members of the church (S.C., 26). The liturgy involves both transcendent and historical dimensions. The Lord once died and rose in human history, is now present in word and sign, and will come again at the end of time. Human history assumes transcendent meaning and forms the essential context for the church's life and mission to the nations (Mt 28:18-20; G.S., 40; S.C., 10). The Lord's presence in liturgy is a powerful source of renewal for the church and its members. The liturgy prompts the church to respond to Christ with the same whole-hearted, obedient, and kenotic love it finds in its Lord. This is the soul of worship and inspires repentance for sin and self-donation to neighbor.

The return to the scriptures has likewise promoted a renewed understanding of the moral life. The primacy of the word means that Christ and the new covenant must be central to a person's moral life. Because conversion and repentance, faith and right living are intimately related, morality can no longer be considered simply a matter of keeping specified commandments. On the contrary, being called to life in Christ involves a positive mission that knows no pre-determined limits. The council referred to it as an "obligation to bring forth fruit in charity for the life of the world" (O.T., 16; also G.S., 43).

Personal conscience occupies a pivotal position in the moral life. Conscience draws life and power first from an inner encounter with God and a related awareness of responsibility to live according to goodness, charity, and truth. It prompts the person to search for the specific and correct insights needed in moral judgments. It continues to direct and bind the person as the concrete decisions of daily life are made (G.S., 16-17; P.H., 3). The council's teaching on conscience and its mandate for the renewal of moral theology emphasize the essentially religious and apostolic qualities of moral life. This implies that liturgy and social engagement will be more integrally related as two aspects of one overall personal response to Christ's presence and call.

A closely related question is the influence of the revealed word on the living of daily life. The word can have important practical effects on the person since it calls to conversion, fuller ecclesial and missionary participation, and deeper living of the theological and moral virtues. Whether the word also specifies how one should decide issues of behavior depends on a number of related considerations. Any use of the scriptures first requires a competent exegesis of the relevant texts. Also needed is a carefully reasoned judgment whether and to what degree the text actually applies to a given contemporary problem (D.V., 12). The effort to determine morally correct conduct must furthermore take into account the meaning of the created order for the matter to be decided; this involves the attempt to specify what the dignity of the human person requires within the context of the common good (G.S., 26, 35).

These considerations rule out the direct and literal application of most scriptural passages and demand great care in the use of others. Reverence for the scriptural word goes hand in hand with the assembly of data from human experience and the working out of reasonable judgments. The task of forming good practical decisions for moral life is sometimes as difficult as it is necessary. It requires humility and cooperation with others, a tolerance for shortcomings and mistakes, and a readiness to accommodate honest differences of judgment in many areas (G.S., 16, 17, 43, 74, 75; D.H., 2-3).

Recent official statements on social issues reflect these developments. In these texts church authorities have tried to scrutinize the signs of the times and interpret them in the light of the gospel (G.S., 4). This has given Catholic social doctrine a more contemporary, concrete texture and brought the gospel itself into high relief. The need to address alienation and injustice in the world is explicitly described as an important part of the church's overall response to God's work in Christ. Work on behalf of justice is required by the gospel (G.S., 72, Paul VI, Evangelii Nuntiandi, 29-31; John Paul II, Sollicitudo Rei Socialis [S.R.S.], 13, 31).

The greater reliance on specifically Christian grounds and motives is a significant development. Rational arguments in support of specific conclusions tend to be de-emphasized in recent documents, but not eliminated from consideration. Church authors commonly disclaim the ability or the responsibility to work out concrete solutions to actual problems; they leave this task to others who are in a better position to carry it out (e.g., G.S., 33, 42-43; S.R.S., 41). This approach applies to the responsibility and consciences of people at all levels of church and civil societies. At the same time, there are more substantial references to the function of the liturgy with respect to social issues. Liturgy educates to justice, forms a Christian conscience, lends religious significance to human activity, and prompts action on behalf of justice and peace in the world. Social engagement in turn should inform one's participation in the liturgy (1974 Synod of Bishops, Justice in the World; S.R.S., 48).

The effort to read the signs of the times and interpret them in the light of the gospel reflects a greater historical consciousness and the imperative to subordinate all human activities to the word of God. This has led recent social teachings to highlight the affinities between faith and social issues and between liturgy and efforts on behalf of justice and peace. This more integral outlook can be expected to continue to mature. It should contribute to a positive reception of Catholic social doctrine and a better appreciation at the local level of the dynamic bonds among God's word, liturgy, and conscientious work for justice and peace in human society.

See Liturgy and Christian life; Liturgy as prophetic

John C. Haughey, ed., The Faith That Does Justice (New York: Paulist Press, 1977). Christopher Kiesling, "Liturgy and Social Justice" Worship 51 (1977): 351-61. Mark Searle, ed., Liturgy and Social Justice (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1980). R. Kevin Seasoltz, "Justice and the Eucharist" Worship 58 (1984): 507-25.

WALTER J. WOODS

SOURCES, EARLY LITURGICAL

Sources for the study of early Christian liturgy do not commonly take the form of liturgical texts (missals, prayer books, etc.) or systematic treatments of liturgical subjects. In consequence, it has often been concluded that early Christian liturgical practice and thought were "undeveloped" or "fluid."

In fact, even the earliest writings of our period, from the letters of Paul and the traditions underlying the gospels onward, come from communities which understood themselves to be constituted by baptism and eucharist. For their authors, the liturgical gatherings of the church are primary theological data, concrete evidence that God is bringing into being a new people through the death and resurrection of Christ and the outpouring of the Spirit as a witness to the inbreaking of the Kingdom of God. All the remains of the period, including its apologetic and theological no less than its more strictly liturgical—including catechetical and homiletic—writings, have to be studied with an eye to their liturgical allusions.

The Oral-Formal Tradition

The allusive character of this evidence is due in particular to the fact that early Christian liturgy, like its Jewish and pagan counterparts, was an oral-formal phenomenon. The early liturgical gatherings were not lacking in basic shape and structure, in the use of specific confessional formulas, and structures of prayer. While what was said allowed for improvisation and adaptation, it was not by any means "extemporaneous" in our modern sense. It followed rules, essentially unwritten, but important for that very reason to be observed by those responsible for their conduct if others were to take their appropriate parts. But it was, in principle and practice, not something to be written down for reading in the manner of later times. Those familiar with the classical tradition of poetry and oratory, and of public speaking or rhetoric more generally, will at once recognize here an assumption as natural to that time as it is foreign to ours.

The oral-formal character of early Christian liturgy helps to explain the general value placed on liturgical language as a means of appropriating and transmitting the Christian proclamation (tradition, paradosis), as in the famous dictum of Prosper of Aquitaine that the structure of prayer underlies the structure of belief ("Lex orandi statuat legem credendi"). But it has a specific significance for the study of the sources which provide us with descriptions of liturgical gatherings. These sources were written only in particular circumstances, with the specific purposes of preservation, explanation and—often most important—when there was dispute over what should be done and said. These sources are badly mishandled when studied, and even printed out, as if they were extracts of liturgical books of the sort with which we are familiar. They need to be studied in the light of the particular purposes which impelled their writing in the time before circumstances made continuation of the oral-formal tradition difficult.

The Physical Evidence

Early Christian liturgy, like that of any period, is physical as well as vocal. The physical evidence of places used for liturgical gatherings has at last begun to receive the attention it deserves. This evidence includes the badly called "house churches" ("Christian houses" or sometimes, by an obvious association, "temples of the Christians"), renovated domestic structures of which we have increasing evidence from the 2nd century onward. It also includes the baptistries and basilicas, and the complexes of buildings of which they were part, erected under the auspices of Constantine and his successors following the period of persecution. These all, whether still in use or in ruins, tell us much about the character and significance of the rites for which they made physical provision. So, too, do the pictorial evidence of the catacombs at Rome and elsewhere, the wall decorations of the later buildings, which show us the people who gathered for the Christian meetings and the vesture and furnishings with which they were familiar.

The NT and Contemporary Writings

Particular problems are posed by our earliest written sources. Many but by no means all of these writings were later collected into the NT. The rest were designated "Apostolic Fathers" by the Anglican patristic scholar, Archbishop James Ussher (d. A.D. 1656). For our purposes, all of these writings provide evidence of the liturgical practices of the communities of the first and early 2nd centuries. Those later regarded as "scriptures," however, must also be studied for their subsequent liturgical influence. A case in point is the command of Mt 28:19-20, to "baptize into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit," itself an interpretation of the significance of baptism rather than a liturgical formula, which had a wide influence on later catechetical and baptismal practice. Another, is the Last Supper "tradition" of 1 Cor 11:23-5 (cf. Mk 14:22-4; Mt 26:26-8; Lk 22:17-19), once again not itself a liturgical formula, which became the "institution narrative" incorporated into later eucharistic prayers.

Paul and the Gospels. Among the writings which later became part of the NT, the Pauline letters deserve special attention. 1 Corinthians contains our earliest references to baptismal practice, at least in the negative sense of insisting that it is baptism "into the name" of Christ rather than that of the baptizer (1:15). It also contains our earliest references to eucharistic practice, in the form of instructions for the observance of the blessings over the bread and wine mandated by the Last Supper "tradition" (11:17-43), with its own even earlier implication that the eucharist is a "memorial" of the new paschal sacrifice of Christ (cf. 1 Cor 5:7-8). In both cases, these rites are interpreted by Paul as entrance into and sustenance in the life of the members of the body of Christ effected by the Holy Spirit (12:12-31).

Within the Pauline collection there are more allusions to baptism than to the eucharist. Indeed, the long discussion of the new life in Christ in Rom 6:3-8:17 (cf. Gal 3:27-4:7), with its reference to baptism into the death of Christ as establishing the identity of the baptized as members of his risen body through the Spirit, takes on something of the form of a post-baptismal catechesis. Moreover, the "Pauline" author of Ephesians, perhaps originally the covering letter of the collection, draws on this discussion, and on themes from Colossians, for his broadly baptismal interpretation of the new unity of Jews and Gentiles fore-ordained in the plan of God (Eph 1:13-18; 2:4-10; 13-19).

The synoptic gospels, however different in genre from the Pauline letters, must also be read as intended for communities constituted by baptism and eucharist. Here baptismal allusions include reference to Jesus' death as a baptism foreshadowing the martyrdoms of principal disciples (Mk 10:38-40; Lk 12:50). Moreover, in Matthew the account of the baptism of Jesus is so treated as to anticipate the new relationship to God, in Christ, through the Spirit in which the baptized stand, and into which others are to be brought. Indeed, the command of Mt 28:19-20 ("make disciples . . . baptizing them 'in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit' . . . and teaching them . . .") may well assume a pattern of practice, conversion, baptism, and catechesis, not unlike that assumed by Paul.

Synoptic eucharistic allusions abound. The accounts of the miraculous feedings (Mk 6:41-2; 8:6-8; Mt 14:19-20; 15:36-7; Lk 9:16-17), which employ the technical language of "taking, blessing over, breaking, and giving," had almost certainly been taken as foreshadowings of the eucharist before their incorporation into these narratives. Moreover, the inclusion of a form or forms of the Last Supper "tradition" (cf. 1 Cor 11:23-5) in the passion narrative, and its placing of the last meal on the day of the slaughter of the Passover lambs, is a crucial element in its view of Jesus' death as a new Passover sacrifice. Whatever the historical accuracy of this narrative, it incorporates an already established "tradition" conveying this interpretation of the death of Jesus through the use of eucharistic terminology familiar to its readers.

Of particular interest is Lk 24:13-35, where the appearance of the risen Christ to the disciples at Emmaus is recounted in language reminiscent of a eucharistic meal, perhaps even suggesting familiarity with an introductory interpretation of the scriptures but certainly employing the technical language of "taking, blessing over, breaking, and giving" at the supper of which the risen Christ is the host.

In the gospel of John, baptismal and eucharistic allusions are carefully disguised. Moreover, the subject of baptism is easily recognized in the discussion between Jesus and Nicodemus over being "born again" through the Spirit (Jn 3:1-15), while allusion is again made to the baptism with which the disciples must be baptized (18:1). Similarly, while the Last Supper "tradition" is replaced with the account of the washing of the disciples' feet and its accompanying command (13:3-11), eucharistic interpretation is given in connection with the miraculous feeding (6:25-65) and in the discussion of the vine and branches at the last meal (15:1-8). Baptism and eucharist are doubtless to be discerned in the references to water and wine (or blood) in the account of the marriage feast at Cana (2:1-11) and in the passion narrative (19:34).

Other NT Evidence. Among the other writings now collected in the NT, special interest centers on Hebrews, which exhorts those who have been baptized and have participated in the eucharist against apostasy in the face of persecution (6:1-8), and was later appealed to as grounds for rigorous refusal to restore apostates to the communion of the church (see below, Cyprian). I Peter, whether or not it is the baptismal instruction some have found it, assumes that its readers belong to the community of the baptized (1:3, 21-23; 2:2) and are eucharistic participants (2:5). Revelation, which describes its visions as received on the Lord's Day (1:9-10), has been thought to reflect a structure of scriptural interpretation and eucharistic action, and certainly promises the martyrs "heavenly manna and . . . a new Name" at the final "marriage feast of the Lamb" (2:17; 19:7-9).

More specific references to baptismal and eucharistic practice are found in the Acts of the Apostles. While something like a paradigmatic sequence of repentance, baptism "into the name of Jesus Christ," and the gift of the Spirit, seems to be assumed (2:38), the accounts of baptisms (presumably drawn from diverse sources) do not exhibit this sequence in practice (8:9-16, 26-40; 10:44-8). The reference to a daily "breaking of bread" in the primitive Jerusalem community (2:46), if it is eucharistic, is unusual in view of the normal practice of meeting for the eucharist on the Lord's Day. But clearer, even graphic, is the account of Paul's healing of Eutychus during a meeting for the "breaking of bread" at Troas (27:7-12), presumably on the evening of the end of the Sabbath and the beginning of the Lord's Day on the Jewish reckoning of days from sunset.

The Apostolic Fathers

The works designated "Apostolic Fathers" also contain allusions to the significance of baptism and eucharist in the same period as that of the NT.

Of these, two are Italian in provenance.

"The first letter of Clement to the Corinthians" (1 Clement) is a formal letter from the Roman church, to be dated after the Domitian persecution at Rome in A.D. 96, supporting the authority of the leadership of the Corinthian church against certain detractors. The letter probably has the baptized in view when it speaks of the duties of those who bear "the name" of Christ (58:1-2). But it certainly has the eucharistic community in view when it elaborates the Pauline theme of the various functions of the members of the body of Christ (1 Cor 12:12-31) with a complicated analogy between the responsibilities of the high-priest, Levites, and people in offering the sacrifices of the old covenant and the functions of the apostolically appointed leaders and members of the church (1 Clem 42-44). Moreover, the lyric blessing prayer for the unity of the church, with which the letter draws to a close (59:3-64:1), is a free adaptation of the structure of Jewish blessing prayers with which we may assume Clement was familiar from eucharistic use.

Closely related to 1 Clement, both in time and place, are the apocalyptic visions of the Shepherd of Hermas, which exhort the leaders of the church to oversight of the baptized (Vis. IX, 7-10), and take baptism as the mandate for repentance and the cultivation of purity (Man. III, 1-7) in seeming qualification of Heb 6:1-8.

Of Asian provenance are the letters of Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, written to the churches he expected to visit on his way to martyrdom at Rome in the reign of the Emperor Trajan (d. A.D. 117). In warning against "docetic" teaching of a proto-Gnostic sort, which denies the incarnation of the Word, Ignatius asserts the importance of the eucharistic gathering of the baptized with the bishop, elaborating Johannine themes (cf. 1 Jn 1:18-25, 5:6-12) to show its importance as exhibiting the faith that "there is only one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ and one cup to unite us in his blood" (Philadelphians 4; cf. ad Eph 13:1, Smyrna 7:1, etc.).

Also of Asian provenance is the Martyrdom of Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna (d. A.D. 156), himself numbered liturgically among the "Quartodecimans" who observed the Passover on the Jewish 14 Nisan (see below, Justin). This work, which contains evidence of later elaboration of various sorts, nonetheless preserves a blessing prayer attributed to Polycarp at the time of his death (chap. 14), which may well reflect his normal eucharistic blessing prayer but is here adapted to giving thanks for his being worthy of death and asking that he be accepted as a "pleasing sacrifice." Like the blessing prayer of 1 Clem. 59:3-64:1, it is evidence of the free Christian use of the form of Jewish blessing prayers.

Didache

Among other writings "The teaching of the twelve apostles" (Didache), was long unrecognized in an adapted version incorporated in the late 4th century Apostolic Constitutions (Apost. Const.), but is now known through the late 19th-century discovery of an independent MS. This is an unusual 2nd-century Greek compilation and editing of early Aramaic materials from Syria-Palestine (a minority view says Egypt) perhaps as early as the late 1st century. In its present 2nd-century form, Did. brings together moral instruction (the "two ways" document) (I-VI), directions "about baptism" (VII) fasting, and prayer (VIII), and "about the eucharist": blessings to be said over wine and bread before the meal and a connected set of blessings to be said afterwards (IX-X). There follows directions covering the right of visiting prophets to give thanks and the need to appoint bishops and deacons (XI-XV), together with an exhortation to observe the Sunday eucharist (XIV).

As a 2nd-century document, Did. follows an outline roughly similar to that found in Justin and Hippolytus (see below), in which a pre-baptismal catechesis precedes a description of paschal baptism and eucharist, and is followed by reference to the Sunday eucharist and other matters. It is, for this reason, sometimes called an early "Church Order," though the particular circumstances which impelled its effort to conform earlier materials to newly emerging norms of practice are not clear.

As to these early materials, interest perhaps naturally centers on the blessings to be said before and after meals, unquestionably Christian adaptations of the Jewish Sabbath and festival meal blessings. The order of wine and bread, and the lack of reference to the Last Supper "tradition," still causes some skepticism regarding them. But plain words of the text, as well as the paschal context in which they have been set in conjunction with baptism, makes it likely that they are eucharistic blessings, and even that the connected series after the meal, Christian adaptations of the Jewish blessings over the final "cup of blessing," supply us with the long-needed clue as to the structure of prayers into which the blessings over the eucharistic bread and wine were set together when it became normal to gather for the eucharist apart from an actual meal.

2nd and 3rd-Century Evidence

From the mid-2nd century to the end of the period of persecutions, we have an increasing body of liturgical evidence, in the form of actual descriptions of liturgical practices, as well as of other writings with liturgical implications. The former, Justin Martyr, "Apology" (I Apol.) and Hippolytus' Apostolic Tradition (Apost. Trad.), require special attention, though at least a selection of the latter must be noticed.

Justin. Justin, I Apol., the work of a teacher of the Greek-speaking Roman church (d. A.D. 167), is easily neglected where it is assumed that liturgical writings will be of the sort with which we are familiar. As a general explanation and defense of Christianity for a pagan readership, it concludes with a description of Christian meetings for baptism and eucharist (61-7) designed to allay suspicions to which their private character gave rise and consequently incomplete from our perspective. Despite its generality, however, this description precisely follows the pattern, not of Justin's making, whereby details of paschal baptism and eucharist ("how we dedicated ourselves to God when we were made new through Christ," 61) are followed by reference to the Sunday eucharist ("on the day called of the sun, there is a meeting in one place," 67). Indeed, this pattern, roughly that already encountered in the present Did., doubtless reflects the practice of the Roman church once the Passover had come to be celebrated on a Lord's Day following the Jewish feast, as was the case by the time of the visit of Polycarp of Smyrna to Pope Anicetus in A.D. 155 (Eusebius, HE, IV, 14).

Moreover, Justin's description is by no means lacking in specific detail. The paschal description assumes pre-baptismal catechesis, fasting, and prayer before a three-fold washing "into the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit" (cf. Mt 26:18-19), after which the newly baptized join the eucharist for common prayers and the kiss of peace (61, 65). The elaborate interpretation of this new birth and remission of sins, with the use of the term "illumination" (cf. Heb 6:4) and exposition of the divine triad (62-4) is likely catechetical in origin.

Justin's appended description of the eucharist (65), repeated briefly in his treatment of its weekly use (67), exhibits the shape of taking, blessing over, breaking (here omitted), and distribution as it had evolved when detached from an actual meal, with a unified oral-formal blessing prayer and assenting Amen. His interpretation of the rite, as a "memorial" commanded by Jesus (cf. 1 Cor 11:23-6), participation in the body and blood of Christ, and the pure sacrifice of the New Covenant (66, cf. Dial., 41, 70, 117), likely reflects the themes expected to inform the blessing prayer. But the treatment of the Sunday eucharist adds reference to preliminary readings from the Jewish Scriptures and the "memoirs of the apostles," followed by a homily, before the common prayers and kiss of peace, and thus provides our earliest evidence of such a Christian adaptation of the synagogue service in connection with the Sunday eucharist.

Irenaeus. Unavoidable among theological writers of liturgical significance is Irenaeus of Lyons (d. 190?), native of Asia Minor, correspondent of members of the Roman church, presbyter and bishop of the Greek-speaking community at Lyons. His "Detection and refutation of falsely so-called Knowledge" (Adversus Haereses) is at once a response to Valentinian, Marcionite, and Gnostic teachings and a compendious presentation of Christian belief of far-reaching influence. His brief "Demonstration of Apostolic Preaching" (Dem.) is a catechetical digest of its main themes.

Irenaeus' liturgical value is at once seen in his main contention that his opponents rely on a false interpretation (hypothesis) of the scriptures different from the apostolic tradition (paradosis) communicated by the bishops at baptism (Adv. Haer. 1.8.1, 9.1, 4, cf. III.2.2, 3.3). This tradition is "what we believe" about the one God and Father, the one Word incarnate in the flesh, and the Spirit which communicates new life in Christ to believers (I.10.1, cf. I.3.6, 22.1, II.28.1-3). Not only does Irenaeus refer here to the baptismal catechetical instruction with which he is familiar and which would eventually take shape in baptismal confessions of faith (creeds), but his whole work is, in genre, an expanded form of such instruction.

Irenaeus' treatments of baptism and eucharist assemble and develop now traditional interpretations, particularly those of baptismal rebirth (I.21.1, II.22.4, III.17.1) for the remission of sins (III.12.7) and the gift of righteousness and incorruption (III.17.2), and of the eucharist as the prophecies' pure sacrifice of the last days (IV.17.5), the oblation commanded by the Lord (IV.18.1), in which the bread and wine become the body and blood of Christ after "the invocation of God" (IV.18.5). In his own view, the baptismal and eucharistic use of water, bread, and wine as means of participation in Christ show the goodness and usefulness of the physical creation (III.17.2, IV.18.2, 4-6, V.2.2-3) in contrast to the views of his opponents, who are inconsistent in continuing their use (IV.18.5).

The Apostolic Tradition. It is hard to overestimate the importance of the identification (E. Schwartz [1910] and R.H. Connolly [1916]) of a Coptic document, discovered in 1848 and called "An Egyptian Church Order," as the "Apost. Trad." listed among the writings of Hippolytus of Rome (d. 236). Now pieced together, on this basis, from a hitherto unidentified Latin MS, from Greek excerpts included in the later 4th century Apost. Const., and other sources, this work is now generally regarded as that of the aforesaid Irenaeus theologian, presbyter of the Roman church, opponent of the bishops Zephyrinus (d. 217) and Callistus (d. 233), and schismatical bishop. As such, it purports to describe the proper conduct of the rites of the Roman church in Hippolytus' time. While still not a liturgical book it is an invaluable discussion of Roman liturgical practice.

Apost. Trad. follows the outline already familiar from Justin. Here, however, an extensive section on ordinations (2-15) precedes that on paschal baptism and eucharist, and includes a detailed description of the eucharist of the newly ordained bishop. In consequence, the paschal section (16-23) treats baptism in detail, but adds only brief notes on the eucharist which follows it, while the Sunday eucharist is omitted in the interest of a scattering of directions on other matters, including the continuation of communal meals whose non-eucharistic character is insisted on (25-26).

The Roman provenance of Apost. Trad. is evident from its broad structural similarities to Justin, and its use in the paschal baptism of interrogations accompanying the three washings ("Do you believe . . . ? I believe . . .") which employ much of the language of the Roman baptismal confession later attested by the letter of Marcellus of Ancyra to Pope Julius I in A.D. 340 (Epiphanius, Panarion 72) and Rufinus of Aquileia's early 5th-century Commentary on the Apostles' Creed.

But an uncertain number of features of Apost. Trad. may be Hippolytus' own adaptations or proposals. His rigorist position on the restoration of apostates in persecution is evident in the care with which he insists catechumens be selected (16), in his acceptance of the "baptism of blood" as an alternative baptism in water (19), and just possibly in the dramatic positioning of the baptismal interrogations. The careful descriptions of the functions of bishop, presbyters, and deacons in the ordination prayers (3, 8, 9) may also owe something to his own views, as may the unified language of his episcopal eucharistic prayer or anaphora (4), the theological stress on the independent existence of the word in its opening thanks for the work of God, and in the appearance of an oblation of the "memorial" and invocation of the Spirit following the "institution narrative." In this latter respect, its similarities with later Eastern eucharistic prayers rather than the later Roman canon have often been noticed. But there is no reason why a Roman prayer should not have had parallels with contemporary Asian types (cf. Martrydom of Polycarp, 14), and we are not clear as to the limits of improvisation acceptable at the time.

Some Other Evidence

Only a selection of other materials from the 3rd century can be noticed here, and then only for its correspondence with the types of evidence thus far encountered.

Didascalia. From Syria, perhaps quite early in the 3rd century, comes the "Catholic teaching of the twelve apostles and holy disciples of our Savior" (Didascalia), now reconstructed by conflating a Syrian translation with Greek excerpts incorporated in the later 4th-century Apost. Const. Though often described as a "church Order," this work does not follow the structure which we have in the present Did., Justin, or Apost. Trad., but is a "disorderly" collection of material on various matters of belief and morals. Its liturgical interest lies in its provision, in connection with comments on the pastoral responsibilities of the bishop, of prayer forms for the reconciliation of the excommunicate (6-7), its brief reference to the bishop's liturgical functions (9), and its assortment of graphic details concerning the physical arrangement and appropriate conduct of the sorts of people who might gather at the eucharistic meetings (15).

Tertullian and Cyprian. Other contemporary liturgical evidence is found in the two major Latin writers of the period. Of these, Tertullian (d. A.D. 220), is the earlier and more comprehensive, a presbyter (?) of the church of Carthage, appropriator of Irenaeus and contemporary of Hippolytus, who came to accept the claims of the Montanist martyrs to a special possession of the gifts of the Spirit. By contrast, Cyprian (d. A.D. 258), bishop of Carthage, though a devoted reader of Tertullian, supported the authority of bishops to restore apostates to communion, and opposed the claims of the "confessors," who had been prepared to die in persecution, to special powers of forgiveness.

Tertullian's treatise "On Baptism" (De bapt.), the only work on the subject in our period, might be the exception to our rule that liturgical matters are not subjects of treatment in themselves were it not essentially an anti-Gnostic tract, concerned to defend (cf. Irenaeus) the regenerative power of water, the primordial source of life, when the Spirit is invoked upon it, the triune name employed, and the Spirit given through anointing and laying on of hands (2-8). In pursuing this subject, Tertullian provides details of baptismal practice not otherwise found in Justin or even Hippolytus (e.g., baptism at Pentecost as well as at the paschal feast), as well as, with the challenge of persecution in view, endorsing (16) the "baptism of blood" (see Hippolytus) and discouraging (18) the apparently hitherto common practice of baptizing infants (i.e., "households").

Tertullian, "On prayer" (De orat.) is perhaps more topical, though it is in arguing the superiority of Christian to Jewish prayer that it provides the earliest commentary on the Lord's Prayer (2-9), incidentally taking "daily bread" to refer to the eucharist, "daily" referring to the "perpetuity" and "indivisibility" of our membership in the body of Christ (6). Once again, the treatise supplies details otherwise lacking, in this case of practices of corporate and private prayer, such as comments on kneeling and standing with hands extended (orans), the exchange of the kiss of peace and the reception of the communion, and the prohibition of kneeling at the paschal feast and Pentecost.

More at large, Tertullian develops themes of Irenaeus to the point that the body is washed and fed in baptism and eucharist so that both body and soul may be saved (cf. De res. carnis 8), and introduces his own subsequently influential interpretation of the eucharistic sacrifice as a service or duty assigned as a means of rendering satisfaction to God (De orat. 19).

Cyprian. Cyprian's extensive debt to Tertullian includes an underlying assumption regarding the purity of the church, which leads, in his case, to insistence on the importance of eucharistic communion with the bishop rather than of such extraordinary spiritual gifts as Tertullian had come to value in the Montanists (De unit. eccl. 5-6, 8, 23). Thus he rejected (perhaps recalling Tertullian, De bapt. 15) the baptisms performed by the schismatical bishops who followed Novatian in condemning, in part on the basis of Heb 6:4-8, his willingness to allow the restoration of apostates to communion (Epp. 69-74).

In this badly so-called "rebaptism" controversy, Cyprian was opposed by the Roman bishop Stephen, who supported the reception of the schismatically baptized, and himself, in his stress on unity with the bishop as the guarantee of the purity of the church, inadvertently laid the foundation for the later Donatist schism, which originated in refusal of communion with any bishops who had committed apostasy in persecution. For our purposes, this controversy is further indication, here provided in characteristically Latin form, of the significance of baptism and eucharist as defining true Christian identity.

4th and 5th-Century Sources

With the end of the persecutions and the beginning of the period in which Christianity became the public cultus of the Roman imperial government, the number and variety of liturgical sources multiply, though they still reflect the oral-formal tradition continued in these new circumstances.

Families of Rites. It has been common to speak of this period as witnessing the emergence of "families of rites," results of the growing influence on local practices of the great sees of the time. It would perhaps be truer to say that our evidence, still scattered and incomplete, suggests a more specific process of consolidation, at least in the East.

The Apost. Const. already mentioned as coming from Antioch in the late 4th century, is the central body of evidence. Long available, it has been recognized only recently for the compilation of the diverse materials it is. It opens with directions for various aspects of Christian life (I-VI) containing excerpts of Didascalia, incorporates the blessing prayers of Did. partially reorganized into a contemporary eucharistic structure (VII 25-6), and includes (VIII 1-5) a version of the ordination section of Apost. Trad. If Apost. Const. is still a "church Order" based on the sort of structure of description found in Did., Justin, and Apost. Trad., it has been stretched out of shape by the diverse materials accommodated within it, perhaps in an effort to organize the variety of practices in use in the region of the Syrian capital.

Central to Apost. Const., however, are elaborate directions and prayers for baptism (VII 39-45) and eucharist (VIII 6-15), generally thought to reflect the practices of the church of Antioch itself. Distinctive features of baptism include a unified taking of the confession of faith separate from the washing itself and a subsequent episcopal anointing with invocation of the Spirit. Those of the eucharist include the dismissal of catechumens and litanic prayers of the faithful led by deacons, and an elaborate anaphora similar in shape to that reflected in Apost. Trad. but including extended Preface and Sanctus and introducing diaconal prayers for the living and dead before the concluding doxology.

Other Eastern Evidence. Less well-known from this period is the recently discovered East Syrian evidence of the use in the church of Edessa of the Anaphora of Addai and Mari, notable for retaining early Jewish Christian blessing forms reminiscent of the type found in Did., but set within a structure roughly similar to that elaborated in Apost. Const. From Egypt as well, light has been shed on the background of the Alexandrian Liturgy of St. Mark by the late 19th-century discovery of the "prayer book" (euchologion) of Serapion (d. 360 ?), bishop of Thmuis and correspondent of Athanasius. This collection may have been preserved because of the intrinsic interest of its prayers at the scripture readings, homily, dismissal of the catechumens, and common prayers before the eucharist (1-12), and at the baptismal (19-25) and ordination (26-8) rites. But it also preserves an anaphora different in shape from Apost. Const. and of undoubted Egyptian pedigree (cf. the Der Balizeh and Strasbourg frags.), in which Preface and Sanctus are followed by invocations over the oblation before and after the institution narrative.

For the East in general, however, similarities between Apost. Const. and the later rite of Constantinople suggest that its central sections contain a version of the rites eventually adopted in the new imperial capital. With additions of its own, notably its use of the anaphora attributed to John Chrysostom (d. 407), and occasionally replaced by those of Basil of Caesarea (d. 379) and the Jerusalem Liturgy of St. James, these latter rites eventually commended themselves widely where imperial influence extended in the East.

Egeria, Diary of a Pilgrimage, the account of a journey of a Gallo-Hispanic religious woman through Asia Minor, Palestine, and Egypt at the turn of the 5th century, offers graphic descriptions of liturgical life, including the paschal rites at Jerusalem and its environs.

The West. Comparable Western evidence is restricted to much later books, all showing effects of the promotion of the Roman rites under the Frankish auspices of Pepin IV and Charlemagne in the 8th and 9th centuries. The peculiar features of the north Italian Ambrosian Missal, the Gallo-Hispanic Missale Gothicum and Bobbio Missal, and the Gallo-Irish Stowe Missal, many of which may reflect the appropriation of Eastern practices through Italy, must be studied in the light of such writings as those of Ambrose of Milan (d. 396) and Isidore of Seville (d. 636). Evidence of the rites of Latin Africa, before the Vandal conquest of the 5th and the Justinian reconquest of the 6th century, is entirely in the form of allusions in such writings as those of Augustine (d. 421).

Of the Roman rites themselves, after the 4th century introduction of Latin as the liturgical language, such evidence as we have comes from similarly later books, though it is here possible to identify the oldest form of the Roman eucharistic prayer or canon, wrongly attributed to Gelasius I (d. 496), and early seasonal materials which may partly derive from the time of Leo I (d. 461), before encountering the work attributed to Gregory I (d. 604), whose name is traditionally attached to the rites adopted by the Frankish liturgical reformers. Apart from a certain restraint in the adoption of Eastern practices, and the formulation of a eucharistic canon different in structure from that of Apost. Trad. but perhaps not entirely without contemporary parallels (cf. Ambrose, De sacramentis), we may think of the earliest Latin rites of the Roman church as similar to those which preceded them.

Catecheses and Homilies. Of unique significance for this period are the bodies of catechetical and homiletic material, which are themselves liturgical in character as well as in contents, which reflect the newly public position of the church, and provide a wealth of detail about liturgical practice.

While we have references to catechetical instruction before baptism in Justin and Apost. Trad., and in Tertullian, Origen (d. 254 ?), and other earlier writers, it is from the 4th century onward that we have evidence of two types of formal episcopal addresses, the first delivered at and after the formal acceptance of candidates for the paschal baptism, devoted to the exposition of the teachings of the baptismal confession of faith, and occasionally the Lord's Prayer, the second consisting of post-baptismal ("mystagogical") addresses devoted to the meaning of baptism and eucharist for those who had now participated in them.

Of such addresses, we have a series, not always complete or given in the same years, by Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem (d. 386), Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 428), and John Chrysostom (d. 407), the last as presbyter of Antioch. We also have two post-baptismal catecheses of Ambrose of Milan, De mysteriis and (now widely accepted) De sacramentis. Among other evidence, Augustine, De catechizandis rudibus, provides advice and a model narratio to a Carthaginian deacon charged with the initial address to those seeking admission as catechumens, while his De fide et symbolo purports to be based on his own catechetical instructions as presbyter of Hippo. Maximus the Confessor's (d. 662), Mystagogia, is a mystical interpretation of the Constantinopolitan eucharistic liturgy of his time, and an important source for its study, rather than a catechetical instruction.

Such earlier homilies as survive include that of Melito, bishop of Sardis (d. 190), On the passover, and the great collections of the scriptural homilies of Origen. From the 4th century onward, however, comes a profusion of homilies too great to be enumerated, including series of Gregory of Nazianzus (d. 390), Gregory of Nyssa (d. 395), John Chrysostom, and Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444), as well as of Ambrose, Augustine, Leo I, and Gregory I. With respect to all of these, it can only be noticed, in general, that the public liturgical assemblies of this period allowed and even required new forms of homiletic address, having in view non-Christians as well as Christians, and larger physical spaces than had before been the case. Several writings of the period, most notably Chrysostom, On priesthood, but also Gregory of Nazianzus, On his flight, and even Ambrose, On the duties of ministers, are of interest as addressing or reflecting the challenge of preaching in these circumstances.

Such catechetical lectures and homilies were, in this period as distinct from ours, regarded as integral parts of the liturgy itself rather than as attachments or additions to it. Initially taken down in shorthand in the course of delivery, they often reflect another stage in the appropriation of classical styles of public address, in this case oratory, for Christian purposes.

Later Theological Issues

Liturgical theology in this period turns, as might be expected from that before, on the theological significance of liturgical practice. Thus, both Athanasius (Ad Serap. I. 14, 30) and the "homoiousian" Basil of Ancyra (Epiphanius, Panar 73.3) argue for their different ways of stating the equality of the persons of the Godhead against the Arians on the ground that Father, Son, and Spirit are together at work in baptism, while the enhanced specificity of the invocation (epiklesis) of the Spirit on the oblation in the various forms of anaphora in the Constantinopolitan rite emphasizes what seemed the orthodox trinitarian implications of earlier liturgical prayers. While the Carolingian theologians, Ratramnus and Radbertus, developed their several views of the relation of the body and blood of Christ to the eucharistic bread and wine with references to a variety of early Christian writers, it is doubtful if the latter would have understood the terms of the debate, prone as they were to proceed by reference to the theology inherent in liturgical language rather than to raise questions on the basis of it.

Conclusion

The erosion of the oral-formal tradition of liturgical practice is not easily traced in our sources themselves. The consolidation of rites in the East may well have impelled a new concern for precision in liturgical language, though the 9th-century Constantinopolitan euchologion (Barberini MS) is the first surviving document to appear to assume the actual use of liturgical books. For the West, it may be assumed that inroads upon the classical tradition required the use of such books at a much earlier date, perhaps particularly in Spain and Gaul, though the late date of our actual sources, which generally assume their use, makes it hard to say when this occurred. It is only in Carolingian ivory bookcovers that liturgical books appear on altars in tandem with books of the gospels, though these may reflect a practice long-familiar at the time.

The issue here is not a small one. Much that is central to the character of early liturgical practice hinged on the continuation of the oral-formal tradition, and was obscured when the cultural decline of the later centuries necessitated its abandonment. At that point, whenever and by what stages it occurred, different notions of the nature of Christian liturgical gatherings began to make their influence felt.

B. Altaner, Patrology, trans. H.C. Graef (Edinburgh-London: Nelson, 1960). L. Bouyer, Eucharist (Notre Dame and London: University of Notre Dame Press, 1968). A. Benoit, Baptême

chretien au second siecle (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1953). R.F. Evans, One and Holy: The Church in Latin Patristic Thought (London: S.P.C.K., 1972). C. Jones, G. Wainwright, E. Yarnold, eds., The Study of Liturgy (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1978). J. Jungmann, Mass of the Roman Rite, 2 vols., trans. F.A. Brunner (New York: Benziger, 1950). A. Kavanagh, The Shape of Baptism (New York: Pueblo, 1978). J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, 3rd ed. (New York: McKay, 1972). G.A. Kennedy, Classical Rhetoric and Its Christian and Secular Tradition (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1980). T. Klauser, A Short History of the Western Liturgy (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1969). W. Rordorf, et al., The Eucharist of the Early Christians, trans. M.J. O'Connell (New York: Pueblo, 1978). T.J. Talley, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (New York: Pueblo, 1986). E.C. Whitaker, Documents of the Baptismal Liturgy, 2nd ed. (London: S.P.C.K., 1970). F. Van der Meer, Early Christian Art (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1959).

LLOYD G. PATTERSON

SOURCES, LITURGICAL

The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican II stated that the liturgy "is the outstanding means whereby the faithful may express in their lives and manifest to others the mystery of Christ and the real nature of the true Church" (S.C., 2). Earlier in the century Pope Pius XI had written that "the liturgy is the most important organ of the ordinary magisterium of the Church" (Quas primas, A.A.S., 17 [1925], 603). Statements such as these continue the line of thinking of the famous 5th-century axiom of St. Prosper of Aquitaine, who declared that the law of worship constitutes the norm of belief: legem credendi statuit lex orandi. The liturgy has enjoyed a privileged place throughout history in the handing down of the tradition of the church, especially the belief tradition. A study of liturgical sources is thus part of the total theological task of uncovering the past in order to better understand the present and to shape the future.

According to a leading specialist in the area of liturgical sources, Cyrille Vogel, liturgical literature includes three kinds of documents: (a) liturgical books properly so-called, that is, the books actually utilized in the course of Christian worship; (b) works that treat of divine worship such as commentaries, sermons, and explanations or descriptions of liturgies; (c) liturgical monuments such as sacred buildings, inscriptions, mosaics, paintings, sculptures, liturgical furniture and vestments. (The work of Cyrille Vogel, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources, is absolutely unequalled as an aid to the study of liturgical sources.) This article will limit itself to key written sources of the West.

The very earliest Christian liturgical sources would be found in sacred scripture itself which included certain liturgical acclamations, doxologies, hymns and credal confessions. While NT data contain such elements, we do not find any actual order of service or any complete description of early worship. Nevertheless, the NT does reveal a great deal about the life of faith of the first Christians and the expression of that faith. An important aspect of this would be their prayer life.

Major liturgical sources would be the early church orders. Most important among them should be mentioned: Didache (Syria ca. 50 (?) -150); Apostolic Tradition (Rome/Alexandria, ca. 215); Didascalia Apostolorum (Syria, 220-250); Apostolic Constitutions (Syria, ca. 380); Canons of Hippolytus (Alexandria, 320-350); Testament of the Lord (Syria, 5th century). The Apostolic Tradition is a work of bishop Hippolytus of Rome (the majority opinion) and it stands out as a unique ante-Nicene liturgical source due to the outstanding influence it played on later liturgies both in the West and in the East. The document was written in Greek, but comes down only in Coptic, Arabic, Ethiopic and Latin versions. The recommended English translation is that of G.J. Cuming, Hippolytus: A Text for Students (Grove Liturgical Study 8), Bramcote Notts, 1976. Also high on the list of important sources among these church orders would be the Didascalia Apostolorum which makes use of the Didache and which in turn is used by the later Apostolic Constitutions.

The Fathers of the church and other ecclesiastical writers often allude to the liturgy, even though the information they provide is usually fragmentary and incomplete. Justin, Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose and Augustine would be good examples of writers who provide us with helpful descriptions of liturgical practices of the times. In a famous description of the liturgy of the Lord's Day Justin writes: "On the day which is called 'Sunday', all, whether they live in the town or in the country, gather in the same place. Then the memoirs of the apostles or the writings of the prophets are read for as long as time allows. When the reader has finished, the president speaks, exhorting us to live by those noble teachings. Then we rise all together and pray. Then, as we said earlier, when the prayer is finished, bread, wine and water are brought. The president then prays and gives thanks as well as he can. And all the people reply with the acclamation: Amen" (First Apology, chap. 67).

Another valuable source for the description of early worship (again, without providing the actual texts of the liturgies) is the diary of a female pilgrim, probably a nun, who traveled to Egypt, the Holy Land, Edessa, Asia Minor and Constantinople at the end of the 4th century: J. Wilkinson, trans., Egeria's Travels, London, 1971, and 2nd ed., Jerusalem, 1981. She describes in great detail the Jerusalem liturgy of the year 383. Since she seldom makes reference to the scripture readings, one should complement this particular source by using the parallel lectionary of the time: A. Renoux, Le Codex Arménien Jérusalem 121, Vol. 1, Turnhout, 1969; Vol. 2, Turnhout, 1971.

The ancient Christian era was a period when local churches created their own liturgical formulas. Improvisation was the task of the presider of the gathered community. Worship was a corporate action, and the leader spoke in the name of the entire community. He directed the service from tradition, the historical tradition that Jesus instituted the rite of the eucharist. Local churches were quite free, however, to develop the forms of this worship in diverse manners and styles. There was no set formula and the presiders certainly varied in personal talents. As Justin had put it: "The president then prays and gives thanks as well as he can."

In time some of the prayers began to be written down and we have the libelli missarum, oral improvisations put into written form. They certainly must have been a great help for less gifted celebrants. The earliest and most well known collection of libelli missarum would be the Verona collection: L.C. Mohlberg-L. Eizenhofer-P. Siffrin, eds., Sacramentarium Veronense, Rome, 1956. This collection is sometimes called the Leonine sacramentary, but in reality, is neither a work of Pope Leo nor does it seem that it was a book actually used at the altar. Vogel says of this collection: "It appears too haphazardly put together and too incomplete for that (being used at the altar), and it follows the unusual plan of distributing its formularies according to the months of the civil calendar rather than according to the plan of the liturgical year" (p. 39).

While the Verona collection does not contain a eucharistic prayer, it does contain some very important prayers for the study of liturgy, e.g., ordination of bishops, deacons and priests (nos. 942-954), and the oldest nuptial blessing (nos. 1105-1110). Of its 1,331 formulas (most coming from the 5th and 6th centuries), 175 made their way into the Missal of Pius V of 1570.

The next major liturgical source to be mentioned would be the so-called Old

Gelasian Sacramentary: L.C. Mohlberg-L. Eizenhofer-P. Siffrin, Liber Sacramentorum Romanae Ecclesiae Ordinis Circuli, Rome, 1960. This was truly a sacramentary, and played an important role as a liturgical source in the Western church. The Vatican manuscript (Reginensis latinus 316) of this sacramentary is the only one of its kind and is as important for the history of art as it is for the history of liturgy. It is considered a major work by those in the fields of pre-carolingian paleography and early medieval book art. It was used at Rome during much of the 7th (some would even say 6th) and the first part of the 8th century. It was carried into Gaul and widely used there, at least until around 750 when the book was copied at a monastery of northeastern France (probably Chelles), giving us the famous Vatican manuscript, Reginensis latinus 316. The sacramentary is a "mixed" book in that it represents an intermingling of Roman libelli of both papal and presbyteral usages, and in that it is a mixture of both Roman and Frankish liturgical elements. Vogel comments on the latter: "These Gallican additions should not be regarded as blocks of material mechanically juxtaposed to the older Roman elements but as fresh additions or combinations which were gradually amalgamated, to varying degrees, with the older Roman structures" (p. 67). Such an opinion represents the view of the majority of researchers, but some would disagree, and the matter is still far from settled. At any rate, the influence of the Old Gelasian Sacramentary can be shown by the fact that 344 of its prayer-texts are to be found in the Missale Romanum of 1975.

The Vatican manuscript of the Old Gelasian Sacramentary is in a particularly fine state of preservation. This is due to the fact that a few years after this copy was made the liturgy contained in it was replaced by a new type of liturgy which resulted from the Romanizing effort of King Pepin. This source is called the Frankish Gelasian or the Eighth-Century Gelasian Sacramentary. A number of manuscripts that survive of this type of liturgy postulate the existence of a single archetype called the Sacramentary of Flavigny, which is now lost. The Sacramentary of Flavigny was assembled by a team of Benedictine monks around 760-770. It represented a fusion of different types of Roman sacramentaries that had penetrated Gaul by the mid-8th century. Its goal was to provide a liturgy that was eminently usable by parishes and monasteries. The best extant source for this category of liturgy would be: A. Dumas-J. Deshusses, eds., Liber Sacramentorum Gellonensis, Turnhout, 1981.

Besides the Old Gelasian and the Eighth-Century Gelasian, another type of Roman Mass book circulated in northern Europe and exercised a major role as a liturgical source. This was the Gregorian: J. Deshusses, Le Sacramentaire grégorien (3 vols.), Fribourg, 1971, 1979, 1982. This work goes back to the 7th century when a sacramentary was drawn up from the libelli used for papal liturgy both at the Lateran and at stational liturgies. Vogel explains: "Although this distinctive book can no longer be attributed to Gregory the Great (590-604), it was probably redacted under Pope Honorius I (625-638) and was gradually augmented as new stational liturgies and fresh feasts emerged in the course of the VII and VIII centuries" (p. 79).

When Charlemagne sought a "pure" Gregorian sacramentary from Pope Hadrian I, the pope sent something in the realm of a gift rather than a usable sacramentary (called in history the Hadrianum). The book had to be supplemented for practical usage, and scholars now agree that the author of the supplement was St. Benedict of Aniane rather than Alcuin as was previously held.

Benedict used a wide range of liturgical sources in composing his additions. Vogel summarizes: "Thanks to all these additions, Benedict of Aniane contributed mightily to the resulting hybrid Romano-Frankish liturgy destined to become the liturgy of the entire Latin patriarchate" (p. 89). Of all the various types of Gregorian sacramentaries, it was this Hadrianum with the supplement of St. Benedict of Aniane that was the chief source for the Missale Romanum of 1570 and the Missale Romanum of 1975.

The Frankish or Gallican component of this hybrid liturgy was the product of the 5th to the 9th century (when Charlemagne introduced the Hadrianum). There was a great sense of liturgical freedom under the Merovingian kings of the 7th and 8th centuries, consonant with the very nature of the Franco-Gallic people itself. One striking characteristic of the Gallican rite was a type of variable eucharistic prayer. There is certainly no one "pure" Gallican liturgical source, but perhaps most fruitful for study would be the Vatican manuscript of the beginning of the 8th century representing liturgical usage in Gaul during the 7th century, the Reginensis latinus 317: L.C. Mohlberg, ed., Missale Gothicum, Rome, 1961.

The sacramentaries contained only the prayers needed by the celebrant and not the directives or descriptions of the rite, or at least not in any extended way. Thus the sacramentaries had to be supplemented by the ordines. The classical collection of these is: M. Andrieu, Les Ordines romani du haut moyen âge (5 vols.), Louvain, 1931, 1948, 1951, 1956, 1961. The ordines were absolutely necessary from the 8th century onward in the churches of Europe north of the Alps due to the changing forms of worship. At first the Roman ordines traveled northward in the form of independent entities, being gathered together as collections only in Gaul. The form in which we possess them is a hybrid one, Romano-Frankish or Romano-Germanic. They vary in size from being a single page to the size of a book, and in date of origin from the 7th to the 8th century. Just as the sacramentaries contained things other than strictly the prayers of the presider, so the ordines contained things other than the descriptions of the rites, e.g., prayers, didactic material, etc.

The ordines played a key role in the history of Western liturgy at least until the appearance of the pontifical, the book that resulted from combining the non-eucharistic ordines with the corresponding prayers from the sacramentary. Without doubt, the most important was a collection compiled by a monk of St. Alban in Mainz in the middle of the 10th century. Andrieu recognized its unique importance and called it the "Romano-Germanic Pontifical" by which it has been known ever since. C. Vogel-R. Elze, Le Pontifical romano-germanique du dixième siècle (3 vols.), Vatican City, 1963-1972. Since this was the collection the Ottonian emperors took with them to Rome and imposed there, it became the major point of departure for all later episcopal books. This is important insofar as the collection contained many non-Roman elements, which when fused with the Roman, gave rise to a new hybrid liturgy. This liturgy was celebrated in Rome, and then passed on to the entire Latin West.

The first official edition, in the modern sense, of the pontifical was that of Pope Clement VIII in 1595. This was the first time in the history of the church that a pontifical was edited by a pope which was to be the unique model, abrogating all other previous pontificals in the Latin church.

Up until the end of the 13th century the pontifical contained not only the non-eucharistic texts for bishops but de facto also rites for priests as well. The book for priests (excluding the office) was the ritual. The history of the ritual shows that it developed proximately from the pontifical and remotely from the sacramentary. Interestingly, the oldest rituals are monastic. Before the 12th century rituals are most frequently found attached to the monastic collectary. One discovers the following general trend in the historical development of the ritual: a move from monastic to parochial to diocesan to national to international. One important ritual went through sixteen editions over a period of 75 years (20 years prior to Trent and 35 years after Trent): the Liber Sacerdotalis of Alberto Castellani, O.P., Venice, 1523. It influenced the Ritual of Santori (1612) and the first official Roman ritual (Rituale Romanum Pauli V) of 1614. Unlike the first official pontifical whose use had been strictly compulsory, the ritual of 1614 was only recommended for use.

After the Protestant Reformation the ritual took on an increasingly important teaching role with catechetical comments being inserted into the rites (monitiones). Another such didactic effort among liturgical sources would be the expositiones missae. Since the patristic period there had been the practice of "exposing" certain things (in the catechetical sense) as the texts of scripture, the Our Father and the Creed. In the 9th century this practice was extended to the Mass prayers. It was considered the job of the parish priest not only to be able to lead the prayers but also to understand the meaning of those prayers. The expositiones missae were thus written to instruct priests with the hope that their knowledge would filter down to the people to whom they preached and gave instructions. The weakness of the effort was that the expositiones tended to stress the allegorical aspects of the liturgy, often to the detriment of the essentials. Certainly the most well known writer of such treatises would be Amalarius of Metz of the 9th century: J.H. Hanssens, ed., Amalarii episcopi opera liturgica omnia (3 vols.), Vatican City, 1948-50.

The same 9th century witnessed the beginning of a dramatic change: the change from the sacramentary (containing only the prayers that the priest recited) to the full missal (the Missalis Plenarius) which contained everything, even the readings. This change was more than a shift in the contents of liturgical books. It represented a new way of viewing the liturgical action. The liturgy of the eucharist was no longer a joint action of celebrant, singers, ministers and people; it was now seen as the action of the priest. By the 11th century the priest is obligated to recite by himself even the sung parts of the Mass.

Sacred Scripture has always been viewed as a unique liturgical source. The Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy of Vatican II reflected this long tradition: "Sacred Scripture is of the greatest importance in the celebration of the liturgy. For it is from Scripture that the readings are given and explained in the homily and that psalms are sung; the prayers, collects, and liturgical songs are scriptural in their inspiration; it is from the Scriptures that actions and signs derive their meanings" (S.C., 24). The historical development of the lectionary is a complicated terrain. The opinion that Gregory the Great fixed the readings at the end of the 6th century is no longer held. It seems that great freedom and variety existed in the area of scripture readings at Mass. It was pretty much the local bishop who regulated the choice and length of the readings. The gospel tradition has left more traces of evidence and is thus easier to study, yet the epistle tradition is more archaic and preserves older features all along the way ("epistle" in the wide sense to include all non-gospel readings, including the OT readings). The most important recent insight into the historical development of the lectionary reveals that the epistle tradition and gospel tradition grew up as independent entities, and were combined only much later on, and then in a rather haphazard way. For Gallican usage the most important lectionary is: P. Salmon, Le Lectionnaire de Luxeuil (2 vols.), Rome, 1944, 1953. For Roman usage, the readings that were fixed in the Missale Romanum of 1570 were basically those of the Comes of Murbach of the 8th century.

For the liturgy of the hours, no special liturgical book existed at the beginning. The Bible sufficed. The psalms were chanted from memory and the prayers were improvised. In time, just as was the case for the eucharist, the best of the prayers were collected in libelli and eventually they found their way into the sacramentary and then into the collectary. Eventually other books were used in the recitation of the office: the office-lectionary, the antiphonary for sung parts, the psalter, etc. By the 11th and 12th centuries, as many as ten different books were involved. When all of these were brought under one cover around the 12th century it was termed the breviary. Scholars today recognize that that did not involve a reduction or curtailment of texts, nor did it have to do with private recitation outside choir. It had more to do with the changing nature of monasticism. S.J.P. Van Dijk stated: "Once interest had been turned towards study, the intellectual level of monastic society as such rose. Every monk became a professional liturgist, able to take an active part. The ancient choir books were no longer a mystery to him nor a prerogative of the few leading authorities. Both his education and the elaborate ritual required that he should have access to the whole text of the whole office" (p. 35).

While the breviary contained the official prayer of the church, the prayer book of the laity escaped any such official control and was called horae (book of hours). In origin it grew out of the breviary in that it was comprised of the elements that grew up as accretions to the official office, as the seven penitential psalms, the office of the dead and the office of the Blessed Virgin. The horae are crucial for understanding the piety of the Middle Ages since they shaped to a great extent the spirituality of the laity. While it is true that no two manuscript horae are exactly alike, one major source in this area would be: V. Leroquais, Les Livres d'Heures Manuscrits de la Bibliothèque Nationale (3 vols.), Paris, 1927.

The liturgical sources involving musical notation present a unique case. We simply do not possess any such manuscripts until the 9th and 10th centuries. Most would argue that they simply did not exist, since the chant was handed down orally. A minority position would hold that there were earlier manuscripts with neumes, but they have been lost. One of the oldest Roman graduals dates from the mid-9th century (the Cantatorium of Monza), but it contains only texts without any musical notation. The terminology for the chant books is not always easy to determine. Some authors would argue that the parts of the Mass sung by the schola cantorum were gathered together in the antiphonary while those sung by a soloist were contained in the cantatorium (e.g., Ordo Romanus Primus used the term cantatorium for the book used by the cantor at the gradual and alleluia verse). At any rate, in time both these books were combined and from the 9th century were called the gradual. A very helpful source whose earliest manuscript is the 8th century (again, the texts only) would be R.J. Hesbert, ed., Antiphonale missarum sextuplex, Brussels, 1935. For the office, see: R.J. Hesbert, ed., Corpus antiphonalium officii (5 Vols.), Rome, 1963-1975. For an extremely helpful overview of musical manuscript sources, see: "Sources, MS," pp. 590-702 in Vol. 17 of The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, Washington, D.C., 1980.

During the first millennium or more of the church's life, liturgical books were compiled according to functions; a particular book contained only (more or less) what would be needed by its user. During those centuries no liturgical book contained everything needed for a liturgical service. Some historians list more than fifty different liturgical books when they study the domain of liturgical manuscripts. Approximately one out of ten manuscripts we possess today is a liturgical manuscript, and happily, certain scholarly organizations are attempting to preserve them for posterity. The most important organ in this regard is C.I.P.O.L.: Centre International de Publications Oecuméniques des Liturgies; 4, avenue Vavin; 75006 Paris, France. It comprises a group of liturgists from different churches from throughout the world whose goal is to put major liturgical sources on microfiche.

A perennial problem for researchers in the area of liturgical sources is the frequent confusion encountered in the cataloging of liturgical manuscripts. Liturgists and librarians do not always use the same nomenclature. The problem seems to be twofold: first, the difference between the modern and the medieval notion of just what constituted a liturgical book; and second, the diverse way that librarians and catalogers have solved the problem. Today we limit a liturgical book to one which contains the approved, official cult of the church. All others are books of private devotion. The medieval notion was not so stringent. Custom played a greater role: a liturgical book was one that contained the elements of the praying church, at all levels. As to cataloging, some have listed certain manuscripts as liturgical which others would have listed as biblical, patristic, or hagiographic.

Working in liturgical sources today is a far easier task than in the past. Not only has cataloging improved, but critical editions of texts are now often available and some are accompanied by concordances and tables that greatly simplify the task of working with these sources. A unique service has been provided by the Subsidia series of Spicilegium Friburgense: University of Freiburg Press; Freiburg, Switzerland. Two in the series deserve special mention: Klaus Gamber, Codices liturgici latini antiquiores (2 vols.), Freiburg, 2nd ed. 1968; A. Hänggi-I. Pahl, eds., Præx eucharistica: Textus e variis liturgiis antiquioribus selecti, Freiburg 2nd ed. 1978. The former is an absolutely indispensable bibliographical tool for working with early Western liturgical sources and the latter provides students with a collection of eucharistic prayers from ancient liturgies that they could never possibly have been able to gather themselves.

For work in recent liturgical sources a helpful service has been provided by R. Kaczynski, Enchiridion documentorum instaurationis liturgicae I 1963-1973, Rome, 1976. The documentary collection includes one hundred eighty separate items in 3,216 numbered sections. The arrangement is chronological rather than topical, but there is a large analytical index. Perhaps its greatest usefulness is the inclusion of certain thus far unpublished curial sources. For English-speaking students of liturgical sources a very helpful collection is: Documents on the Liturgy 1963-1979: Conciliar, Papal, and Curial Texts, Collegeville, 1982. Topically rather than chronologically arranged, this collection includes 554 official documents concerning the Vatican II liturgical renewal.

Unique to the Vatican II liturgical reform is the inclusion of introductions (praenotanda) within the new liturgical rites. These provide far more than mere rubrical background for the new rites; they provide the theological and pastoral context in which the rites are to be understood and interpreted. The same can be said for the general instruction (institutio generalis) provided for the new rites of eucharist and liturgy of the hours. Never before in the history of the church have liturgical rites been accompanied by such rich theological introductions. At times there can seem to be a tension or dichotomy between a particular rubric or text in a new rite, and the introduction accompanying that rite.

Likewise there can be conflict between an aspect of the Vatican II liturgical reform and the Code of Canon Law. The Code states: "For the most part the Code does not define the rites which are to be observed in celebrating liturgical actions. For this reason current liturgical norms retain their force unless a given liturgical norm is contrary to the canons of the Code" (C.I.C., 2). The changes that the new Code wrought on the Vatican II liturgical reform are listed in Emendations in the Liturgical Books Following upon the New Code of Canon Law, Washington, D.C., 1984.

Examining liturgical sources from the point of view of the written prayer-texts only can lead to an impoverished understanding of the liturgical event, or even, in the extreme, to a misunderstanding of it. The written prayers have to be contextualized by the wider surrounding or environment. The music, the architecture and bodily posture help create a certain mood. The mind-set of the participants, created by previous liturgical experience and by catechesis, all contribute to the way the prayer-texts are "heard." Alexander Schmemmann refers to this as "liturgical piety" and comments that "it is important for the historian of worship to know that the 'liturgical piety' of an epoch can in various ways fail to correspond to the liturgy or cult of which the piety is nevertheless the psychological perception or experience. . . . Liturgical piety has the strange power of 'transposing' texts or ceremonies, of attaching a meaning to them which is not their plain or original meaning" (p. 77). This makes the study of liturgical sources a very complex task. The prayer-text of a particular period must be studied in the light of a vast arena of other disciplines: social-political history, art history, various social sciences, etc. Thus, the prayer-texts found in sacramentaries and other liturgical books are but part of a puzzle that is being put together only in a gradual and collegial way.

This accounts for the fact that liturgical sources are of capital importance for the study of theology. The faith life of the church is not limited to the sphere of the conceptual; it is a total lived experience, and the liturgy is a unique expression of that experience.

See Church order; Documents, Roman liturgical, since Vatican II; Liturgical texts in English; Reform, liturgical, of Vatican II

Cheslyn Jones, Geoffrey Wainwright, Edward Yarnold, eds., The Study of Liturgy (New York: Oxford University Press, 1978). David Power, "Two Expressions of Faith: Worship and Theology," in Liturgical Experience of Faith (Concilium 82). Herman Schmidt and David Power, eds. (New York: Herder and Herder, 1973): 95-103. Alexander Schmemmann, Introduction to Liturgical Theology (Portland, Maine: American Orthodox Press, 1966). S.J.P. Van Dijk and J. Hazelden Walker, The Origins of the Modern Roman Liturgy (Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960). Cyrille Vogel, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources, trans. and rev. William Storey and Niels Rasmussen (Washington, D.C.: Pastoral Press, 1986). Herman Wegman, Christian Worship in East and West: A Study Guide to Liturgical History, trans. Gordon Lathrop (New York: Pueblo Publishing Co., 1985).

GERARD AUSTIN, O.P.

SPIRITUAL DIRECTION AND LITURGY

The relationship between spiritual direction and liturgy has received little attention or study and, as a result, has seldom been explicated.

Liturgy, for our purposes here, can be understood in its common usage as "the public worship of God by the church." Spiritual direction can be described as the help a person seeks in order to grow in a loving relationship with God, thereby affecting all aspects of human life. In a specifically Christian context, spiritual direction has the focus of a person's growth-in-Christ. It looks to develop a relationship with God, who is addressed by Jesus' love-word Abba, and to enhance in one's life and activity the manifestation of God's reign which is brought about by Jesus' gift of the Spirit and human cooperation with grace. Although Christian spiritual direction is ordinarily thought of as a personal relationship between the one directing and the one being directed, even in this form of spiritual direction there is necessarily present a prior liturgical setting—the Christian community at worship—in which both parties are situated and formed.

How are spiritual direction and liturgy related in our Christian lives? Faith is the common foundation, and the lived expression of our faith comes in prayer and in action. This lived expression of faith is identified by the word spirituality. So a spirituality provides the necessary context for both the understanding and the practice of liturgy and spiritual direction. Prayer provides the atmosphere of the spiritual direction encounter just as it underlies every liturgical expression. Both liturgy and spiritual direction not only presume some sort of prayer stance, but they are also directed towards developing a richer prayer life in every participant as well as a more reflective and vibrant Christian action. In this way, liturgy is always in the context of a spirituality. Spiritual direction, for its part, is aimed at the personal integration of a spiritual life—developing one's own spirituality within a basic Christian spirituality and, at the same time perhaps, nuanced by a specific school of spirituality also present in and approved by the church.

Liturgy and Spirituality

A liturgical spirituality finds its foundation in public worship, that is, the worship of God by a community in the name of the church. But liturgical spirituality encompasses more than the moment of worship since it takes in all our life and activity insofar as we are affected by the liturgical celebration. Whether we consciously recognize it or not, as members of a worshipping Christian community we imbibe some sort of liturgical spirituality. A liturgical spirituality is one way of describing the foundational spirituality of the church, since it always puts us in contact with some aspect of celebrating the paschal mystery which identifies all Christians with Christ.

In addition to a liturgical spirituality, there has also developed a number of particular spiritualities called forth by the Spirit within the Christian community over the centuries. Quite often these spiritualities develop because Christians, moved by the Spirit, attempt to make a creative gospel response more focused to the needs of the culture or the times. Some spiritualities, such as devotio moderna associated with Thomas à Kempis (1379-1471) and his classical work, The Imitation of Christ, or the spirituality popularized by Francis de Sales (1567-1622) in his classical work, Introduction to the Devout Life, were meant for the whole church from their very beginnings. But there remains the more usual development of schools of spirituality rooted in a particular religious life tradition, such as Benedictine, Carmelite, Franciscan, Dominican, Ignatian or Jesuit, Sulpician, and so on. These spiritualities have eventually come to influence the wider church. How each of these spiritualities incorporates liturgical spirituality varies, but a liturgical spirituality remains essential to and compatible with every legitimately recognized spirituality within the church.

Spirituality and Spiritual Direction

Since Christian spirituality basically receives its focus within a liturgical spirituality, we can describe spiritual direction as the help which we receive from our participation in the liturgy of the eucharist and the liturgy of the hours to love and serve God and to live lives infused with Christian principles and values. This foundational spirituality, often called liturgical and particularly identified with a daily participation in the eucharist and office celebrations, has its own corresponding equivalent in a direction which we might signify by the term general spiritual direction. General spiritual direction in no way opposes or eliminates the need for other forms of direction in our personal assimilation of the Christian life. For example, we can also describe a direction which is so identified with the celebration of sacraments other than the eucharist that it can be distinguished by its own designation as sacramental spiritual direction. Finally we can explain direction in its most widely understood contemporary form as personal spiritual direction.

General Spiritual Direction. General spiritual direction considers the instruction, clarification, challenge, and motivating power which comes from the celebration of the eucharist, both in its liturgy of the word, particularly in the scripture readings and their explication in the homily, and in its liturgy of the sacramental action. In a similar way, general spiritual direction looks to the celebration of the liturgy of the hours to instruct, correct, lead on, and stir up the participant in the practice of the Christian faith. No one active in the Christian community, then, is devoid of receiving this kind of spiritual direction for growth and advancement in Christian living.

Sacramental Spiritual Direction. The sacraments which are less frequently celebrated than the eucharist have their own instructional, motivational, and empowering content. This content is distinctive enough to be identified as a kind of spiritual direction called specifically sacramental. The renewal of the sacrament celebrations called for in Vatican II has only served to highlight this spiritual direction aspect. For example, the R.C.I.A. (Rite for the Christian Initiation of Adults) program is recognized for its carefully designed developmental process in Christian growth, not only for the catechumen but also for the baptized—all in terms of the meaningful participation in the sacramental celebration. The preparation and instruction prior to celebrating the sacrament of matrimony is also a clear instance of direction for growth in a whole new stage of Christian living, which the actual sacramental celebration encapsulizes. The celebration of the sacrament of anointing, especially in its communal form, again presents a special occasion for directing people's growth in the central Christian paschal mystery of dying and rising. Finally the Vatican II renewal of the sacrament of penance and its re-designation as the sacrament of reconciliation brought to the fore the area where spiritual direction and liturgical or sacramental celebration have been most closely related throughout the centuries.

Traditionally the Celtic monasticism of the 6th and 7th centuries stressed the sacrament of penance beyond the confession of sins to the identifying and rooting out of one's evil tendencies and the personal directing for growth in the virtuous life. Because St. Columban is credited with bringing the Irish penitential system to the Continent, he remains a major figure in this Western Christianity movement. Because of the private nature of the sacramental encounter between priest and penitent, the direction in this instance is obviously within the context of a liturgical or sacramental rite, but at the same time is very personal in its application to a particular penitent. The Irish penitentials presented patterns of penances appropriate to certain sins confessed by the penitent; this was both an advance in personalizing the sacrament and a movement in adapting advice and counsel to the particular penitent.

Through the confession practices of the Middle Ages and through the clarifications made in the Council of Trent, the sacrament of penance grew in its importance for the personal spiritual direction of the Christian faithful. So frequent was the identification of a confessor with a spiritual director function that more and more spiritual direction was thought of in terms of priestly action. Often the occasion of spiritual direction in seminary training and in the consecrated religious life form was only to be found in the confessional.

Vatican II renewal of the sacrament emphasized anew the dialogic nature of the sacrament. More than just a simple accusation of sins and a pronouncement of absolution, the sacrament is now placed in the context of a dialogue between priest and penitent—with scripture, prayer, and counsel all having their appropriate moment. The sacrament of reconciliation stands out most clearly as a repeated instance of sacramental spiritual direction within the Christian life.

Personal Spiritual Direction. Besides the general spiritual direction which we receive in the celebration of the eucharist and potentially also in praying the liturgy of the hours, and the kind of instruction and empowerment received in sacramental celebrations, particularly in the sacrament of reconciliation, there is a long and constant tradition in the church for the role of the spiritual director, frequently called a spiritual father or spiritual mother, who helps to nurture in a one-to-one encounter the life-in-the-Spirit development of a fellow Christian.

The terminology of spiritual father or mother in the tradition of personal spiritual direction seems to be a parallel usage to the ministry of priests (called "Father") in their nurturing in the Spirit through the celebration of the eucharist and in all the other sacraments. There appears also a similarity in the understanding of the role of sponsors in baptism—sometimes called "godfathers" or "godmothers." The emphasis in the mother-father language is not on the unequal dependency relationship of parent-child since the basic reality is imaged as two adults in this relationship. Rather the reality of two adults coming together in a helping relationship serves to emphasize the consistent way that God works incarnately or sacramentally to bring forth or share divine life. God remains the only source of life (truly the only Abba), and yet Christians at various times merit the analogous use of the abba or mmas terminology as sacraments or instruments of God's dealings with a fellow Christian.

A Relationship of Balance

Spiritual direction and liturgy need to be related in providing a necessary balance in living and growing in the Christian faith. For example, liturgy continues to recall and celebrate God's great interventions in human history, particularly the ultimate intervention in the incarnation, passion, death, and resurrection of Jesus. Spiritual direction, with its emphasis on God's particular action within the personal history of this Christian, needs the largeness of vision provided by liturgy. But through personal spiritual direction, a Christian brings his or her own redemption moments of God's saving action into the community celebration so that each Christian truly fills in what is lacking in the sufferings of Christ. Both liturgy and spiritual direction, then, help form the Christian identity and call forth a personal transformation.

Liturgy provides a ritual—a combination of gestures and language expressions, of music and a total environmental setting for our contact with God. Spiritual direction encourages various means to enhance the growth in prayer—methods and techniques, bodily positions, environmental settings, and so on—and reflectively to integrate one's life activities into a putting on the mind of Christ. While spiritual direction intends to provide a necessary interior vitality to the ritual prayer form to keep it from being merely empty show, the ritual action calls the individual Christian out of a privatized relationship with God to the communal worship which is ours as the body of Christ and with Christ as our head and our one high priest. To enter into liturgical celebration always enters us as individual pray-ers into the prayer shared by all Christians.

Finally liturgy is the prime setting for the celebration of the gifts of the Spirit poured out upon the church. The celebrations of liturgy are made possible only by the Spirit's gifts of ministries accepted by individuals, recognized by the community, and exercised in the name of the Church and in a public manner—the worship of the community. Spiritual direction is also a ministry—a gifting of the Spirit to various members of the church. Spiritual direction, too, must be accepted as a gift by a particular Christian, who then receives in some way recognition from the church to exercise truly a ministry in the church—a public ministry. But in distinction to liturgical ministers, spiritual directors will ordinarily exercise their ministry—public as it may be in recognition—in a private or personal manner with individuals or with groups.

If the liturgy is celebrated in a strong and vibrant manner, there will always be present spiritual direction in some form in the community. If spiritual direction functions in all its various forms among members of the Christian community, then the liturgy itself will continue to be strong and vibrant. For “the liturgy is the summit toward which the activity of the Church is directed; at the same time it is the fountain from which all her power flows” (S.C., 10).

See Spirituality, liturgical

K. W. Irwin, Liturgy, Prayer, and Spirituality (New York: Paulist, 1984). K. Leech, Soul Friend The Practice of Christian Spirituality (San Francisco: Harper and Row, 1980). D. E. Saliers, Worship and Spirituality (Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1984). “Liturgy as a Formative Experience,” Studies in Formative Spirituality (November 1982): 3.

DAVID L. FLEMING, S.J.

SPIRITUAL DIRECTION, RECONCILIATION AND

See Reconciliation and spiritual direction

SPIRITUALITY, LAY

See Lay spirituality

SPIRITUALITY, LITURGICAL

Liturgical spirituality is the participation of a faith community in God's creative and transformative love for the world. Christian liturgical spirituality is the community's participation in the liberating embrace of the world in, with, and through Jesus Christ. “God has given us the wisdom to understand fully the mystery, the plan that was decreed in Christ, to be carried out in the fullness of time” (Eph 1:9-10).

Though the paschal mystery of Jesus Christ is at the heart of all Christian spirituality, liturgical spirituality is formed and informed through the ritual celebrations of the paschal mystery. Though all Christians celebrate the cultic liturgy of the church, Christians who live a liturgical spirituality experience the liturgical life of the church as their source of spiritual direction. For these Christians, the cultic liturgy of the church clearly is "the summit toward which the activity of the church is directed" and "the fountain from which all her power flows" (S.C., 10).

The history of Christian spirituality reflects many ways for growing in and mediating the power of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. The way of liturgical spirituality is one which is nourished and critiqued by the cultic liturgy of the church. The intimacy and infinity of the love of Christ that enlightens the varieties of forms of smallness of heart is particularly manifest in the ritual of the Lord's Supper or eucharist. This communal celebration clearly points to the reality that "The Son of God has united himself in some fashion with everyone. Christ died for all" (G.S., 22). Those who gather to do this authenticate the gathering and the doing by living a liturgical spirituality that embraces all of life.

Though the ritual life of the Christian community is one expression of liturgical spirituality, liturgical spirituality is broader than its cultic expression. While cultic liturgy provides meaning and direction, liturgical spirituality embraces all of life as the content of and context for living in Christ. Paul comes close to this description of liturgical spirituality as he reflects, "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly, as in all wisdom you teach and admonish one another, singing psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs. . . . And whatever you do in word or in deed, do everything in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, giving thanks to God the Father through him" (Col 3:16, 17).

Though there are a variety of approaches that could enhance the understanding of Christian liturgical spirituality, only three will be summarized here. First, some aspects of Jewish liturgical spirituality will be developed, for this spirituality provides foundational understandings for Christian liturgical spirituality. Second, the scriptural meaning of the New Covenant ritualized in the Lord's Supper will be summarized through focusing the transformed meanings of the Passover cups. Third, the manner in which spiritual discipline is inherent in liturgical spirituality will be described.

Jewish Liturgical Spirituality

Jewish liturgical spirituality is the lived awareness that all of life can be a means of becoming holy as God is holy. For a devout Jew, all of life can be liturgy. The prayer of blessing and praise (berakah) enables everything to be a source of remembering who one is in the presence of the All Holy One.

The living word of God, the Torah, and cultic liturgy are central to the living of a liturgical spirituality. Together, Torah and cultic liturgy encompass the life of the community in its ongoing journey into the heart of God. Both foster communion with God which is expressed through actions like those of God. To be holy as God is holy is the purpose both of Torah and of cultic liturgy (Lev 19:2). Though the two are intimately related, they can be considered separately.

Torah has varied meanings. Torah can refer to the first five books of the Jewish scriptures (Pentateuch), the entire Hebrew scriptures (Tenakh), the scholarly exposition of the scriptures as these apply to changing times, and the meditative study of God's living word by the people.

Torah, God's living word, is a creative dialogue of God with the chosen people. Because Torah is God's word, the community will never hear that word in its fullness. At the same time, Torah is addressed to the heart of the community who will hear and have their lives informed by it. The changing contours through which the word of God is heard means there must be ongoing interpretation of that Word (halakha). The ongoing interpretation is no less God's word than the written word.

God's word addresses the heart of the community in many ways. The community must discern the meaning of the address at its place and time in history. Because God's word is greater than human hearing and interpretation, there is no need for everyone to agree on the meaning, as the rabbinical schools attest. As long as the people are living the commandments of loving God and loving others, their interpretation is a valid one.

Commandments are an essential part of God's living word, for commandments unite the doer with the heart of God. Commandments are not fulfilled in merely doing what is specified as religious deeds. Commandments are only fulfilled if the doing somehow unites the doer with the heart of God and the neighbor. To have 613 commandments in Torah is a blessing, not a burden. What other people have so many ways to be united with God?

Commandments guide the covenant community in a way of life that helps them remember who they are as God's people. There are many commandments because all of life, whether eating, drinking, celebrating, journeying, searching, weeping or working, can reveal the living God. To remember is to know the living presence of God; to forget is to become lost in meaninglessness. Whom God remembers, looks upon, or hears has life. Whom God forgets descends into darkness. Commandments are a means of remembering, blessings that further communion.

Those who fulfill commandments will be known by the fruits of communion with God and with others. To be a blessing and not a curse, to be a means of life for all is a sign that the spirit of the commandments is being lived. Because the spirit is what gives and sustains life, not the literal living of the 613 commandments, the meaning of the commandments has been summarized throughout Jewish history. David reduced the meaning of the commandments to eleven (Psalm 15). Isaiah reduced the number to six (Isa 33: 25-26). Micah reduced the meaning to three (Mic 6:8). Amos reduced the number to one (Amos 5:14). The rabbi, Jesus Christ will also do this.

What this points to is that the purpose of Torah and its commandments is communion with the source of life that is known through how one lives. The living word of the living God is an ongoing dialogue with a living and historically conditioned people. Because the word of God is spoken to the heart of the community, there can be no authentic interpretation without the entire community discerning the meaning. The fullness of Torah lies ahead, not behind, so there is room for differences on the journey toward that fullness. The word will not return empty, but it may return with a fullness greater than human interpretation could hope or dream or imagine.

God's living word is known not only through Torah, but also through cultic liturgy that has Torah as a vital part. Cultic liturgy provides expression, identity, and life direction for the Jew. The daily, weekly, and seasonal celebrations of the covenant people are central to Jewish liturgical spirituality. Life's liturgy is given direction through cultic liturgy that provides the sacred space for the community to remember its call to become God's people.

In the morning and evening, the devout Jew remembers the history and mystery of creation, redemption, and covenant. This daily prayer recalls the past, reflects upon the present through the images of creation, redemption, and liberation, and expresses hope for ongoing liberation from all that is not holy. "Help me to be awake to this day . . . alive to beauty and love, aware that all being is precious, and that we walk on holy ground wherever we go" (Gates of the House, p. 3). In the morning and evening, the creed (Shema, Deut 6:4) is recited as well as a variety of blessings that enable the people to remember who they are and can yet be.

The Lord's Day (Shabbat) is a time to remember that rest is as sacred as work if it is the creative rest that God intends. Keeping the Sabbath is doing the work of God. The workers who refuse to do God's work, which is to be recreated on Sabbath, will remain unprofitable servants. Sabbath begins on the eve as God's compassion is recalled. "As we begin this day of holiness, we shall not forget the words of your prophet who called us to share our bread with the hungry, to clothe the naked, and never to hide ourselves from our own" (Gates of the House, p. 29). The ritual of candles, meal, and blessings begins sabbath time that shall not ritually end until the next day's evening service.

Seasonal festivals provide rhythms for liturgical life. In fall, the days of awe usher in the new year with an eight-day period extending from Rosh Hashanah to Yom Kippur. On this holiest day of the year, prayer, fasting, atonement, and forgiveness are the means of furthering the kingdom in this time and receiving blessings in the year ahead. Days of thanksgiving, Tabernacles, are celebrated for seven days in later fall. In winter, a feast of light, Hanukkah, celebrates a variety of accumulated meanings with gifts and joy.

A major festival, Passover, marks the spring season. This festival is kept as a night different from other nights. The ritualized meal provides a clear expression of the past, present, and future meanings of God's liberating the covenant people. Seven weeks after Passover, Pentecost celebrates the receiving of the law of God with new wine and leavened bread.

Jewish liturgical spirituality is guided by the ritualized meanings of that spirituality. Though the whole life of the devout Jew can be called liturgy, Torah and cultic liturgy are central to the formation and expression of liturgical spirituality. There is need to remember who the covenant people are called to be. Torah and cultic liturgy are means for remembering and for living a liturgical spirituality.

For Christians, Jesus Christ is Torah and the source of a new and eternal covenant. Cultic liturgy is a means for Christians to remember who they are as a new creation in Christ. Liturgical spirituality is formed by the ritualization of the memory of Jesus Christ who asks his people to remember by doing what he did and continues to do through the Spirit. The early church ritualized the memory at the Lord's Supper. Some early meanings of this memory can be located in the way Christian Scriptures describe this new and eternal covenant.

The New and Eternal Covenant of the Lord's Supper

Though the Last Supper was probably not a Passover meal, the scriptural accounts structure the meaning of the meal in a framework of Passover ritual. A summarized comparison of the meaning of the Passover cups is one way to illustrate the new meaning that early Christianity assigned to the Lord's Supper or eucharist.

The Passover ritual was opened by blessing this day as one of hope, by a washing, and then by offering and sharing a cup of joy and blessing. The NT accounts have Jesus being joyful for the celebration, and washings occur. The ritual dipping of foods in the dish served as an hors d'oeuvre, with the main meal to follow. The departure of Judas fits in well here (Jn 13:2-15, 21-30; Lk 22:24-27; Mt 26:20-25; Mk 14:17-21).

At the Passover ritual, a second wine cup was mixed, blessed and shared. The ritual meal was served. The youngest child asked the question, "Why is this night different from every other night?"

The story of Passover (haggadah) and its application to the present was then told by the leader. Two psalms of praise and a prayer over the bread were recited. The bread was broken and shared, as was a third cup of blessing at the end of the meal.

For the disciples gathered with Jesus Christ, the night of this Last Supper is a night "different from all other nights." On this night, bread and wine are symbols that have new meaning of a New Covenant. The covenant blood of Jesus Christ will be poured out for all so that sins can be forgiven (Mt 26:29). The radical nature of Jesus telling the disciples to drink his blood can escape contemporary hearers. For the Jews, blood symbolized life and life belonged only to God. Whoever drank blood was acting as God and would be cut off from the covenant people (Lev 2:12; 7:27; 17:10-14; Gen 9:3-5). Now whoever does not eat the flesh and drink the blood of Jesus Christ will not have life (Jn 6:53). The intimacy of this New Covenant with its sharing in the life of God is a dramatic change in religious imagination.

A fourth cup of Passover was a cup poured and drunk for the completion of the Hallel, Psalms 114-118. The participants could eat or drink no more after drinking this cup, for they must continue to taste only the mystery of Passover through the night. To fully taste the mystery of Passover, Jesus Christ will experience a cup of suffering. He prays that this cup be taken away (Jn 18:11; Mt 26:39-44; Mk 14:36-39; Lk 22:42-44). When the cup cannot be taken away, it will be accepted and those who poured it will be forgiven (Lk 23:24).

The fifth cup of Passover is a cup of the future. Some name it Elijah's cup, for Elijah was expected before the fullness of God's kingdom would come. As this cup was poured, the door was opened as a symbol of readiness for the kingdom to come. This cup would not be drunk until the kingdom came. The passion accounts make interesting references to this symbolic cup and to Elijah (Mt 27:47,49; Mk 14:36; Lk 23:37). In the two accounts of the death of Jesus that have been influenced by Psalms 22, the cup is not drunk (Mt 27:48; Mk 15:36). In a third account, the fifth cup is drunk as Jesus announces his life is over. He breathes forth the spirit of the kingdom (Jn 19:30). In a fourth account, the risen Christ gathers with disciples of Emmaus to eat and drink the meal of the kingdom, for the kingdom is here (Lk 24:32). All accounts point to the kingdom that has come in Christ, who now eats and drinks with his friends who are part of that new creation.

The apostles appear on Pentecost as those who knew of this new wine of the kingdom. For the Jews, Pentecost celebrated the receiving of the law of the covenant with new wine and leavened bread. Christian Scriptures point to the transformed meaning of Pentecost. Jesus Christ is the living Word of the living God. The apostles are ridiculed for being filled with new wine (Acts 1:2-13). The new creation of which Peter speaks has its first fruits in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. All can be baptized into this new creation, for there shall be no further distinctions between slave and free, Jew and Gentile, male and female. The Spirit gives gifts to whomever the Spirit chooses.

The Lord's Day was a celebration of the new creation ushered into time through the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The community who gathered to "do this in memory of me" were called to conversion and critiqued for areas of non-conversion. The hope of God for the world had been revealed in Jesus Christ, whose life was given for all. The Lord's Supper celebrated the infinite and intimate dimensions of reconciliation in Christ. It was formative of a liturgical spirituality whose embrace was to be as cosmic as that of the Lord Jesus.

The centrality of the paschal mystery was evident in the spirit of Vatican II. Also evident was the awareness that the paschal mystery of Jesus Christ is incarnated in diverse cultures in diverse ways. There is an awareness today that different cultures must be brought into the Christ-story in a manner respectful of the culture. The evocative, creative, and participative possibilities of Christian liturgical life have only begun to affect the reforms of liturgical life. The universality and inclusiveness of the paschal mystery is only beginning to be symbolized through careful use of liturgical symbols, rituals, language, and persons.

The eucharistic prayers that focus the meaning of Christian faith for many believers reflect one area of needed reform. As the Jewish thanksgiving prayer took on fullness only if it extended to all of the community's life, so the eucharistic prayer is authentically prayer only if it too affects all of the Christian life. Christian prayer is fully proclaimed when it becomes a religious deed. Liturgical prayer is prayer only when it enables the community to consecrate all of life to the glory of God in Christ through the power of the Spirit.

The content and language of the eucharistic prayers have become a concern for liturgists in the last decade because these prayers are among the most familiar expressions of the meaning of the Christian memory. The beginning of the eucharistic prayer (preface) has a variety of expressions of thanksgiving that harmonize with the liturgical cycle of seasons and festivals. An invocation of the Spirit (epiclesis) has been placed before the account of institution to avoid old controversies about a moment of consecration. The Spirit is invoked again after the commemoration of the Lord's death and resurrection (anamnesis). This latter invocation is an inclusive one. The gathered body of Christ prays for "all your (God's) children wherever they may be" (E.P. III); "those whose faith is known to you alone" (E.P. IV); "the entire people your Son has gained for you" (E.P. III) and "those who have died in the peace of Christ" (E.P. IV). The prayers do not forget the gathered community. "Make us worthy to share eternal life" (E.P. II). "Enable us to share in the inheritance of your saints" (E.P. III).

At the same time, there remain areas of necessary reform. The remembrance (anamnesis) still seems preoccupied with the consecratory nature of the institution narrative and with sacrificial language, both of which obscure the consecratory nature of the whole eucharistic prayer. The commemoration could serve the unity of the eucharistic prayer better if it remained a short, recapitulative acclamation of praise and blessing. This could then serve as a foundation for the invocation of the Spirit, who convenes, forms, renews, and inspires the new creation as one body in Christ.

The God-images used in the eucharistic prayers, and the people whose deeds are recalled, are still too selective. God-language and imaging remains impoverished by limited textual imagination. The proof-texting of Jewish history is an embarrassment to ecumenical dialogue. The non-participative structure, the non-poetic language, and the exclusion principle forgets that the community is the context for all prayer texts.

Is there a world escaping religiosity, a racial, religious, sexual, or power symbol distinction among those who claim to be the new creation? Prayers, scriptural readings, intercessions, hymns, aesthetic use of space, gender of prayer leaders, and the poetic expressions of the eucharistic prayer texts can aid or block the liberating power of liturgical worship in different cultural settings.

The unfolding renewal of liturgical spirituality will take the implications of universality more seriously in the coming decades. Ecumenical prayer and dialogue, discernment of cultural diversities and values, and increased sensitivity to the community as primary symbol of liturgical spirituality will affect the renewal of liturgical rituals. These in turn will enhance the liturgy's possibilities for being a school of spirituality. As this occurs, the spiritual discipline inherent in that spirituality may become a more directive and integral part of the Christian life.

Spiritual Discipline and Liturgical Spirituality

Spiritual discipline for Christians flows from discipleship. No one can follow Jesus Christ without the participative discipline of dying and rising. Though there are varieties of private spiritual disciplines, there is also a communal spiritual discipline that is guided by the rhythm of the liturgical year. The liturgical year unfolds the mystery of Christ in festivity and in ferality. There is a time for everything, for fasting and feasting, for being alone and being together, for dying and rising.

Liturgical prayer gives direction to these life rhythms. It provides a framework for the prayer of solitude, which in turn flows back to liturgical prayer. For Christians, the prayer of solitude is not a prayer of isolation, for all prayer has its origin in being a member of the body of Christ. However, the prayer of solitude acknowledges the uniqueness of individual life that is placed before the Lord.

The discipline of solitude is not always a natural response to a busy life. Busy lives can become pre-occupied lives. The choice for solitude is a disciplinary choice to touch and stand in the mystery of God's hope for the world revealed in Christ. This hope leads the individual back to the prayer of the community, for the discipline of Christian solitude cannot stand apart from the body of Christ. To pray in community is also a discipline, for communal prayer requires letting go of personal prayer preferences, ego boundaries, and privatized hearing of the Spirit. It enlarges the community of discernment so that one may be led where one might choose not to go.

Liturgical prayer that guides communal vision is grounded in a discipline of active listening. The prayer of the church, guided through the liturgical year, is not a soft communal mutuality that closes out the world. It is not a prayer that allows the community to cling in fear to each other in self-enclosure. It is rather a prayer of liberation that acknowledges solitary as well as communal responsibility for mediating the Kingdom of God.

The discipline of communal prayer, like that of solitary prayer, offers new possibilities for the discipline of obedience. Listening together to the Lord present in the breaking of bread can open a new and challenging vision of the demands of the kingdom at this point in time. The call to be a community of disciples who are made new in the Spirit can be dangerous if it is heard. To keep the eyes of the heart "fixed on Jesus who inspires and perfects our faith" may lead to a liberation that has not been predicted or hierarchically ordered (Heb 12:2).

The seasons of the liturgical year serve as guide to the traditional Christian discipline of fasting, though fasting is certainly not limited to special seasons. For Christians, as for their Jewish ancestors, fasting is meant to enhance remembering. To remember that the life of Christ has been given for all implies both fasting and feasting. Fasting fosters remembering that there are still many who hunger and thirst because those who have enough will not share their bounty. Fasting fosters the remembering that hungering for the Lord is authenticated by hungering and acting for justice. Fasting fosters remembering that the sacrilege of power and privilege, in the world and in the church, may be a demon cast out only by prayer and fasting.

While fasting is one sign of the kingdom, its sign value can be complemented by feasting. Christians proclaim a Lord whose presence is known at a banquet table. The bridegroom has come, and the wedding feast of the lamb has begun. To pretend it is otherwise is to negate the value of shared tables as a means for conversion to greater sharing of the fruits of the earth and the work of human hands. There is a time for everything, for fasting and for feasting, for solitude and for community, for death and resurrection.

The Christ images that unfold through the liturgical year provide a context for spiritual discipline. Liturgical spirituality is nourished and challenged by the imagination of God revealed through Jesus Christ, whose Spirit continues to make all things new. Christians who live a liturgical spirituality accept the awareness that God's hope for the world is greater than we can hope or dream or imagine. The invitation to enter the imagination of God revealed in Jesus Christ is also a call to experience death and resurrection.

The early church prayerfully accepted the challenge as it prayed "Come, Lord Jesus." The celebration of the Lord's Supper was a call to surrender to the power of resurrection. Liturgical spirituality is grounded in the ritual liberation and spiritual direction into the unfolding mystery. "I am the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end. . . . Come, Lord Jesus" (Rev 22:13, 20).

Regis Duffy, O.F.M., ed., Alternative Futures for Worship, Vol. 1 (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1987). Shawn Madigan, Liturgy, Source of Spirituality (Washington, D.C.: Pastoral Press, 1989). Gates of the House: The New Union Home Prayer Book (New York: Central Conference of American Rabbis, 1977). Frank Senn, ed., New Eucharistic Prayers: An Ecumenical Study of Their Development and Structure (Mahwah: Paulist, 1987). Leo Trepp, The Complete Book of Jewish Observance (New York: Behrman House, 1980).

S. SHAWN MADIGAN, C.S.J.

SPIRITUALITY, PRIESTLY

See Priestly spirituality

SPONSORS FOR INITIATION

Canonical and liturgical reforms have recovered the specialized ministry of sponsor for adult initiation (R.C.I.A.), and amplified sponsorship for the baptism of children, and the confirmation of Catholics baptized as infants, and Christians entering into the full communion of the Roman Catholic church. In each instance, sponsorship entails pastoral and liturgical responsibilities.

The renewal of sponsorship is threefold: it is to be restored to an authentic ministry which provides witness to the faith of the church and guidance for the candidate. As an authentic ministry, sponsorship departs from widespread practice of a minimal ceremonial role. As a witness and guide, the sponsor exemplifies the Christian life and mission while accompanying the candidate through the initiation process and beyond. The manner in which a sponsor fulfills these duties is conditioned by the pastoral situation. For example, a sponsor, distinguished from the canonical godparent, is required for each catechumen at the rite of acceptance into the catechumenate (R.C.I.A., 10). Frequently the sponsor becomes the godparent (patrinus) at the rite of election, though another meeting canonical requirements may be chosen. At infant baptism the godparents (patrini) serve as sponsors in a unique and different manner from adult initiation (can. 872). A sponsor, ideally the candidate's godparent, is required "as far as possible" at confirmation celebrated apart from baptism (can. 892). Throughout this entry

"sponsor" and "godparent" are interchangeable.

All Christians are potential sponsors when they exercise their baptismal commitment and apostolic vocation, "spreading the faith according to their abilities" (R.C.I.A., 9). The presiding minister at the rite of acceptance asks all present if they are "ready to help the candidates find and follow Christ." Indeed, throughout the first three centuries of the church we find no evidence of a delegated ministry of sponsor. Candidates were presented to the bishop by any Christian attesting to their readiness. Amid Christianity's rapid growth in the 4th and 5th centuries, the church designated exemplary persons to accompany the newcomers from the catechumenate through mystagogy and beyond. John Chrysostom called sponsors spiritual parents who instructed spiritual children in Christian living. When the catechumenate went into decline, some bishops reminded all Christians that the task of modeling the Christian life to the candidates was a duty of the whole church and not limited to sponsors.

By the middle of the 5th century, infant baptism was the normal practice, affecting both the catechetical and liturgical structures of formation. Candidates for initiation were assumed to be infants by the 6th and ensuing centuries, and the catechumenal rites were compressed into one Lenten season. Clearly, Christian parents serve as immediate witnesses and guides in the life of faith, but the rite did not recognize them. Sponsors presented the child on a Lenten Sunday, stood by at the scrutinies (which had become multiple prayers of exorcism), and recited the creed on the child's behalf at the baptism. Since the newly baptized would be raised by the parents, the sponsor's pastoral role became less ecclesial and more familial. Godparents were chosen for their ability to provide for a child's physical welfare should the parents become incapacitated or die. With today's improved health and longevity, the role of godparent often is reduced to an honorific bestowed on friends or relatives. Contemporary reforms press for a more supportive and informed ministry, accomplished in part by raising the standards.

The Code of Canon Law (C.I.C.) lists several qualifications for a godparent. Every person must have one godparent, two are allowed, but only one of each sex (cans. 872 and 873). The godparent must be designated by the one who is to be baptized, by the parents, by someone in their place or absence, or by the parish priest or minister. In addition, the godparent must intend to fulfill the role by engaging in a continuous spiritual relationship with the baptized person (can. 874, §1, 1°). Sixteen is the minimum age for godparents: the ordinary may establish another age in his diocese, or the local pastor or minister may grant an exception (can. 874, §1, 2°). Godparents must be fully initiated Catholics (can. 874, §1, 3°), although Orthodox Christians may be a godparent when a Catholic godparent is present (Eucumenical Directory, 48). A validly baptized Protestant may be admitted only as a witness to the baptism, provided a Catholic godparent is designated (can. 874, §2). Godparents must be free of any canonical penalty, and not be the father or mother of the baptized (can. 874, §1, 4° & 5°). Unlike its predecessor, this Code does not prohibit priests and religious from becoming godparents.

Infant Baptism

The reformed Rite of Baptism for Children (1969) recognizes that parents have a more important ministry and role than godparents, for "they will be the first teachers of their children in the ways of the faith" (R.B.C., 70). Since a child's formation begins in the "domestic" church, godparents are "added spiritually to the immediate family of the baptized" and represent the wider church (General Introduction to Christian Initiation, 8). Before the baptism, godparents are to be instructed in the meaning the sacrament and obligations attached to it (can. 851, 2°). During the celebration of baptism, godparents are present and join with the parents in the profession of faith. Thereafter, godparents help the baptized to meet their baptismal promises (can. 872). Both code and ritual expect godparents to assist parents in modeling the Christian life for the child. How godparents fulfill their duties is determined more by local custom and family tradition than legislation.

Adult Initiation

While parents and home constitute the primary experience of church for infants and small children, the adult candidate will benefit from a peer relationship with an exemplary Catholic. Just as the formation process of the catechumenate is directed towards adult needs and experience, the sponsor's duties are more extensive than those required for infant baptism. The R.C.I.A. requires that sponsors "have known and assisted the candidates, and stand as witnesses to the candidates' moral character, faith and intention" (R.C.I.A., 10). The ministry of godparents for adults, officially beginning at the rite of election, is more specific: accompanying the candidates at election, the sacraments of initiation and mystagogy; showing candidates how to live the gospel, sustaining them in hesitancy, bearing witness, and guiding their progress in the baptismal life (R.C.I.A., 11). At the rite of election, godparents testify that the catechumens have faithfully listened and begun to conform their lives to God's word, and shared the company and prayer of their fellow Christians. By accompanying the candidates through the initiation sequence, the sponsors-godparents serve as one-to-one evangelists, and links between the newcomers and broader church community.

In practice the sponsors may fulfill the most significant ministry of the catechumenate. Sponsors join the catechumens at the catechetical sessions, listen and share their faith, introduce and explain Catholic practices such as devotions, the cycles and customs of the church year, etc., assist them with private and public prayer, guide and encourage their participation in various social ministries. With catechists and clergy, they discern the catechumens' readiness for election to the Easter sacraments. Sponsors, therefore, should be instructed with catechists and other ministers. Programs of sponsor formation should include training in listening skills and spiritual direction.

Uncatechized, baptized Catholics preparing for confirmation and eucharist, as well as persons seeking reception into full communion, are assigned sponsors meeting the qualifications noted above. Sponsors, with catechists, clergy and parishioners, are cognizant of the candidates' baptism. Moreover, all ministers respect the experience and prior ecclesial formation which a candidate for full communion brings to the church.

Programs preparing adolescent and adult Catholics for confirmation celebrated apart from baptism increasingly enlist the aid of sponsors. When the candidate has chosen a canonical sponsor not involved in the process, an older teen or adult may accompany the person during formation. Most respond well to these "companions." Some parishes have experimented successfully with a peer ministry whereby fully initiated teens associate socially with the candidates and accompany them in some social ministry. The parents of the candidate may present their child at the celebration of confirmation, but cannot be recorded as the canonical sponsors. When godparents can be sponsors, provided they have fulfilled their initial obligations and meet canonical requirements, they help to demonstrate the link between baptism and confirmation.

The renewed ministry of sponsor, like the catechumenate itself, has challenged the church to realize its missionary character and the communal nature of faith and its formation. Following centuries of religious privatization, Catholics struggle with what it means to share the faith. It is not surprising, therefore, that sponsorship continues to evolve. To the extent the church responds to the dominical mandate, its own nature and the nature of its ministries become more clear.

Michel Dujarier, Le Parrainage des adultes aux trois premiers siècles de l'Eglise; recherche historique sur l'évolution des garanties des étapes catéchuménales avant 313 (Paris: Editions du Cerf, 1962).

A. BRANDT HENDERSON

SUFFERING

Christianity embraces the theme of suffering at the very heart of its belief system. Theologians, past and present and of all persuasions, are by necessity obliged to consider human suffering. Its history is as old as human history. It has limitless shades: death, physical illness, social inequalities, loneliness and alienation. The history of suffering is a continuing and apparently progressive history considering the events of this century such as the holocaust and the threat of nuclear war.

The common human address to suffering has been religious. Religion in its various traditions asks, "Does life have some central meaning despite suffering, and the meaninglessness and chaos it brings?" For suffering passes into the problem of evil and poses the God question: If God is omnipotent and all loving, why evil? Theodicy simply means that the whole question of suffering must be answered in the light of fundamental insights of faith. The theodicy question originates in two felt needs: a sense that human affairs are far worse than any good reason can justify or that our powers alone can alter, and a yearning that refuses to settle for despair.

The classical answers to the problem of suffering paint a very questionable picture of God. They have their sources both in the OT and in the NT. Evils cause suffering and it is God, the creator who made the existence of evils possible in the world, although evil remains constantly under divine control, and ultimately God will abolish all evils. The Hebrew Scripture does not contrast physical and mental suffering since the human reality is not understood in a dualistic manner. Israel was not particularly interested in the origin of suffering, but in its reason and purpose. In an earlier stage suffering was understood as a punishment for sin. A later development brought about serious questions about the suffering of the righteous and the innocent. Suffering is also understood as a divine paideia, and ultimately as vicarious.

Suffering in the Hebrew Scripture

The Hebrew Scripture has much to say about suffering. A great deal of its wisdom concerning suffering can be found in the book of Job. The solution to suffering from a religious point of view is not fateful resignation or denial of God's existence, but belief in a personal God. Job subjects his own understanding, rebellion and pain to God's wisdom. Righteousness and wisdom are at work in human suffering.

Suffering in the New Testament

Jesus' suffering dominates the NT. The passion story is the longest section of the gospel message. The NT word for suffering is paschein, which has a passive meaning: to experience something that comes from outside. It is a question of "bearing" or of "enduring." Jesus "endures" death on the cross.

The gospel writers also describe Jesus' attitude toward those who suffer. The first thing we notice about Jesus' behavior towards those who suffer is that he is never indifferent. The texts tell us that he is moved and upset and describe his compassion and even his tears (Mt 9:36; 14:14; 15:32). Jesus never asks that suffering be offered up to God either for the benefit of the sufferer or for someone else. Jesus' God does not require suffering. In fact through Christ's healing ministry God reveals his will for salvation and health. Nowhere does Jesus declare that suffering brings about one's salvation, or one's sanctification.

What the gospel writers wrote about Jesus' own suffering tends to be different from his behavior towards those who suffer. The NT writers have a great deal of difficulty in making sense of Jesus' suffering and death in light of the fact that they confess Jesus to be the Messiah. Why Jesus' suffering and death were necessary and what meaning they had is variously explained. The Synoptics emphasized the passion prediction and the fact that in his passion he fulfilled the promises of old. His death and suffering is according to the scriptures: it fulfills the Father's will; Jesus "must" suffer (Mk 8:31; Lk 9:22). In Paul the emphasis is on redemption. Jesus' suffering and death are the results of God's love for humankind (Phil 2:6-11).

The call to discipleship demands the acceptance of suffering. Whoever follows Jesus must bear his cross (Mk 13:10-13). According to Paul, the disciple is destined to suffer as Jesus did (1 Cor 4:9-13). Paul gloried in his suffering and saw such suffering as proof of his apostolic commission (1 Thess 2:2).

The suffering of Jesus is the suffering of the innocent. It is closely connected to God. The question is clearly posed: whether God needs human suffering, whether God is incapable of saving woman/man without demanding suffering. The suffering of Jesus poses the question about God: "who is this God who demands such suffering?" It presses the whole issue of theodicy. It is not enough to say that one believes in God. What is important finally is the kind of God in whom one believes.

Classical Answers

While there is no unified theology of suffering, from the time of Tertullian, and especially in Augustine, suffering was considered God's punishment brought about by sin. The suffering of the innocent can be offered up for others.

In John Paul II's letter on "The Christian Meaning of Human Suffering" of February 1989, one finds a summary of the Catholic tradition on the nature of suffering. The basic thrust of the pope's message is that of the salvific meaning of suffering. Suffering seems to be particularly essential to the nature of woman/man. Suffering seems to belong to human transcendence. It is one of those points in which man/woman is in a certain sense destined to go beyond the self, and is called to this in a mysterious way. The emphasis is on the fact that redemption was accomplished through suffering. The church is born of the mystery of Christ's redemptive suffering, and must "meet humanity in a special way on the path of suffering" for "suffering is inseparable from humanity's earthly existence."

Each form of suffering poses the question why? A question about the cause is a question about meaning. In the context of faith in a loving God suffering becomes a question about God. The answer is Jesus Christ: suffering conquered by love. The pope's emphasis is on the intimate connection between suffering and redemption. "It is precisely through his suffering that he accomplished the redemption . . ." "It seems to be part of the very essence of Christ's redemptive suffering that this suffering requires to be unceasingly completed."

This leads the pope to affirm that, "Suffering is something good before which the church bows down in reverence with all the depth of her faith in the redemption."

Toward a Theology of Suffering

Suffering in its widest sense means being acted upon. It means to bear, to undergo. There is a basic connotation of passivity as distinct from activity in suffering. "Receptivity" is essential to suffering. Yet, while there is an essential dimension of passivity in suffering, there is also a great deal of activity. Suffering is the price we have to pay for our limitations, our finitude.

By suffering we mean an anguish which we experience not only as pressure to change, but as a threat to our composure, our integrity and the fulfillment of our intentions. Suffering has the character of a threat to our self-direction and therefore implicitly to our being. It challenges our capacity to maintain ourselves and retain the poise of self-direction. In Heidegger's understanding suffering has the aspect of a threat of non-being. Suffering is disclosive of our own radical contingency, of the fact that ultimately our situation is neither one of our own making nor under our control. Suffering is therefore real anguish because of felt threat to our own integrity and to the real possibility of the disintegration of the self.

Suffering is always an interpersonal phenomenon. Even though we experience it as if it were totally within ourselves, both its locus and source are in relationship. While pain is primarily related to the body and can be inflicted by things, suffering is personal. It is related to one's personhood. We primarily suffer in our relation to others. Suffering is the result of the breakdown of interdependence. Because suffering is essentially interpersonal, it therefore has a social dimension, which has been called affliction.

Affliction involves isolation and abandonment. The degradation shows itself in the isolation that accompanies affliction. The lack of solidarity with the afflicted is a common phenomenon. The dimension of affliction is more fully understood when one realizes the significance of the ongoing quest for the esteem of others.

As basically an interpersonal reality, suffering can be given a meaning. Meaning transforms the whole person and gives a definite directedness to existence. Two basic questions must be asked about suffering in order to give it meaning: what causes suffering and how can it be eliminated? Both questions need to be asked simultaneously in order to avoid any form of masochism. Suffering always remains an attack on human life. It can never be glorified nor sought masochistically. Taken by itself suffering is meaningless. There is also a sharp distinction between suffering before which we stand powerless and meaningful suffering. Suffering can be so acute and so long-lasting that the sufferer feels powerless to break away from it.

Only the suffering that can be changed and from which we can learn is potentially meaningful. Potentially meaningful suffering is one that is not completely passive. What a person does when she/he suffers is the active dimension of suffering. It is in the doing that meaning can be given to suffering, and the doing is in the interpersonal realm. The doing involves the opening of the sufferer's horizons and the transcending of self to the other.

Suffering can lead to a discerning of the vicariousness of interpersonal existence. Since suffering is basically caused by the breakdown of interdependence, that interdependence may be restored vicariously by someone not responsible for the original breakdown. And this is because vicariousness is a fundamental characteristic of interdependence. Personal life is vicarious in that it involves living from and for others. Vicariousness is not something esoteric but the fundamental principle of all personal life. When interdependence has been broken and affliction and alienation have resulted, the breakdown can be remedied by someone not involved in the original breakdown. Interdependence is broken by self-centering. Vicariousness involves self-giving.

Jesus' death on the cross was vicarious. "But God shows God's love for us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us" (Rom 5:8). The vicariousness of Jesus' suffering is not something necessitated by the condition of a sinful world, but is characteristic of the interdependence of human existence. Vicarious and representational suffering is not necessitated by God, but a dimension of Jesus' life of self-giving.

The salvific meaning of Jesus' death is rooted in the salvific meaning of his life, in the radical dimension of his love. There is no need to refer Jesus' death to an arbitrary decision on the part of the Godhead; it has its sufficient basis in the love with which and in which Jesus identified himself with us. Through Jesus' love the depth of interdependence in reality is revealed to us: "No human has ever seen God; if we love one another, God abides in us and God's love is perfected in us" (1 Jn 4:12). One cannot say that God required the death of Jesus as compensation for our sins. It is not possible to make God responsible for what human injustice has done to Jesus. Jesus' death comes as a reaction to his life and ministry, as the consequence of his love.

The paschal mystery is Christianity's final answer to Job's dilemma. God does not instigate our suffering, nor did God decree the sufferings of Jesus. Rather, God participated in them. Our God, Jesus' God, is not the executioner but the co-sufferer. During his life and his preaching Jesus proclaimed God as the God of outcasts, not as someone remote, but as someone close to human reality. Jesus' God is a God for us. The cross reveals God as a redeeming God and a compassionate God.

The cross cannot become the symbol of an evil that no longer needs to be taken seriously. If evil and suffering have already been so definitively overcome, then history is trivialized and human responsibility for the future set aside. The cross cannot function as a sanctuary against the harsh realities of evil in our world. Nor can it be set against the darkness of experience as an apparently thorough victory that easily explains away negation, evil, death. Suffering always remains an attack on human life. It can never be glorified nor sought. It can be given some meaning if ultimately it can be eliminated, and that is the basic meaning of the resurrection.

See Sickness, a Christian view of; Healing

George Arthur Buttrick, God, Pain, and Evil (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1966). A. McGill, Suffering: A Test of Theological Method (Philadelphia: Geneva Press, 1968). John Bowker, Problems of Suffering in the Religions of the World (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970). Michael Taylor, ed., The Mystery of Suffering and Death (Staten Island: Alba House, 1973). Dorothy Soelle, Suffering (Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1975). Andrew Elphinstone, Freedom, Suffering, and Love (London: SCM Press, 1976). E.S. Gerstenberger and W. Schrage, Suffering (Nashville: Abingdon, 1977). Elizabeth Moberly, Suffering Innocent and Guilty (London: S.P.C.K., 1978). Stanley Hauerwas, "Reflections on Suffering, Death, and Medicine," Ethics in Science and Medicine 6:4 (1979): 229-237.

LUCIEN J. RICHARD, O.M.I.

SYMBOL

This essay will focus upon the following issues: (1) the emergence of symbolic elements in worship from Judaism and Hellenistic cultures; (2) the development of symbolic styles; (3) a typology of symbolic styles in Western worship; and, (4) the use of symbols in a post-modern age. For the epistemological, philosophical, and general theological issues that govern the contemporary understanding of symbols, see The New Dictionary of Theology, ed. Komonchak, et al., Glazier, 1987, also s. v. symbol.

Introduction

A working definition for symbol would be a complex of gestures, sounds, images, and/or words that evoke, invite, and persuade participation in that to which they refer.

Symbols have multiple levels of meaning and value. Unlike signs or signals (such as a stop sign or mathematical symbols), symbols do not refer to one item or indicate a one-to-one correspondence between the sign and the signified. They disclose reality by making available to their participants meanings and values that involve them intellectually, emotionally and morally, while exceeding the physical components of the signifier. Part of their emotional power is due to this multiplicity of appeals.

As a result, the regions in which symbols operate are almost universal, as extensive as human life and history. They can be found in daydreams, the nightmares of sleep, the arts and literature as well as in social rituals like the common meal or ceremonies as distantly powerful as presidential inaugurations. Poets, lobbyists, preachers, advertisers, and televangelists use symbols to convince their audiences of the truth of the subject matter, the speakers' sincerity and their products' goals.

This ambiguity of symbols has made them suspect to modern science, linguistic philosophy, and ordinary common sense. Contemporaries find it difficult to trust themselves to symbols since they cannot discern whether the polysemantic character of symbols is deception or simple radical mystery.

This multidimensional character of symbols has made it imperative to limit the discussion of symbols here to the sacraments and the public worship of the churches. However, the ambiguity of symbols has also affected the experience of Christian worship, so the factors that affect the credibility and construction of contemporary Christian symbols for worship will be treated.

Early Christian Symbols Within Hellenistic Judaism. Christians forged their symbols within the molten tradition of Judaism. Hellenistic Judaism itself was not a uniform cultural phenomenon. It included not only the large population of Jews in the Diaspora, but many different groups within Palestine itself (for example, Pharisees, Sadducees, Zealots, and Essenes). Hellenistic Jews, for good or ill, had assimilated many economic, political, and cultural attitudes of the Graeco-Roman world. And since many early converts to Christianity were Jews and Jewish proselytes (Gentiles who partially followed the Torah), the overlap, even syncretism, of cultures was to be expected.

In the synagogue and in the Christian assembly hall at Dura-Europos, in the catacombs in Rome, in the desert libraries of Egypt, and in the emerging NT texts themselves, we can see communities vying for their interpretation of the founding stories, such as Adam and Eve, Noah and the flood, Moses and the journey to the promised land. The vine of David, the root of Jesse flower in Jesus the Christ; the shepherd of Israel gives authority to Christ the Good Shepherd; the sacrifice of Isaac by Abraham illuminates the self-sacrifice of Jesus.

Christian communities initiated their followers into the meaning of their life by surrounding them with words, gestures, and images that interpreted their decisions. On the walls and in sermons, they painted images of rescue: Daniel in the lions' den, Moses striking the rock, Elijah reviving the widow's son, David conquering Goliath. Taking their cue from Jewish catechesis, they described the new way of light and distinguished it from the way of darkness, maintaining that they had the authentic teaching about those primal stories.

In effect, Jewish symbols and stories gained a new referent: the preaching, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. The first exodus was an anticipation of another exodus. Symbols are always embedded in cultural stories. Christians re-examined the symbols by extending the story. In shifting the temporal significance of the symbols, they transformed the religion and found that the story in which they believed no longer had a home in Judaism itself.

The symbols of the shepherd, the teacher, even the chariot-driver or paradise as a garden overlapped with non-Jewish motifs. The teacher of the sermon on the mount could be painted as a philosopher with his pupils; the shepherd could be seen as the god Apollo, piping his flock; Elijah's fiery chariot was analogous to the golden chariot of the sun god. Images that could be extended temporally to include the past (as prologue) and the future (as anticipation) could be reshaped to include the underworld and the eternal spheres.

The process of developing symbols among the early communities of believers involved seeing the polysemy of Jewish symbols to include the crucial instance of Jesus. This changed the historical references of the symbols. Though Hellenistic Judaism included speculation about the cosmos, the increasing analogies with non-Jewish images shifted Christian symbolic structures to emphasize spatial dimensions. The Christian story understood itself as encompassing all of time, from the genesis of the cosmos and its first inhabitants to the final battles between good and evil and the arrival of a new heaven and a new earth—and as including all of space as well. These claims to universal interpretive competence would have seemed mere wishful thinking, had it not been for the appearance of the Christian emperors in the 4th century and their successors in the East and the West, who made Christian worship publicly legitimate and supported the order created by clergy and laity.

In this context of Jewish images and stories, symbolically reinterpreted through the primary Christian story of Jesus, early Christians participated in worship that broke and shared bread and wine, immersed in water, and anointed with oil, using words that invoked divine presence. Entrance into the community meant learning the stories and sharing in the worship. Symbols focused the identity of the believer. By being immersed in water, neophytes died and rose with Christ; they entered the Christian pass-over. Breaking bread together shared the Last Supper of Christ with the disciples and anticipated the future wedding feast. Jesus' symbolic actions, like those of prophets before him, announced the challenging reign of God; Christians reenacted those symbols and created a tradition.

Symbolic Styles. Traditions coalesce around certain symbols and their cultural articulation. Style may be described as that interlocking network of images, metaphors, and symbols that define a particular mode of action and thought. It is style that allows the participant to say "this" is a Graham ballet, a Hemingway novel, or a Brahms symphony. No one would mistake Brahms for Sun Ra or Hemingway for Trollope. Vocabulary, images, grammar and syntax characterize the rhetoric of their creators.

In any particular context, it is possible to describe the root metaphors and basic symbols. The apostolic witnesses that identified themselves with Alexandria (Mark), Jerusalem (James), Rome (Peter and Paul) or India (Thomas) generated styles of worship and attendant theologies. Ritual differences developed as ways of recovering the stories and symbols in specific contexts. Linguistic difference (Greek, Syriac, Coptic, Latin, and eventually Slavonic) shaped the rites with their particular communicative competences. By the end of the 4th century, the main metaphoric expressions in the Eastern empire had been determined. The normative ritual usage seemed to be Jerusalem. Scholars have been able to note how doctrinal differences grew from symbolic expressions.

Even in the Western empire, where Latin was eventually dominant, styles of symbolic expression developed. The Ambrosian rite of the city of Milan and the Gallican rite north of the Alps had their own symbolic particularities. Rites developed around the cities of Toledo and Braga. But by the end of the 10th century, the major ritual metaphors had been determined in the West, where Rome's rituals became the norm.

What we now know as the Roman rite, particularly in comparison with the others in both Eastern and Western churches, is sober and somewhat severe. It made minor adaptations of Eastern ritual elements (the Kyrie, Sanctus, Agnus Dei). But there were primarily a simplicity of movement, austerity of language, and asceticism of gesture. The choreography of processions was dignified and measured.

The rites that developed to the north were more elaborate. The Gallican (French) and Mozarabic (Spanish) rites used more words, reflected the penitential piety of their communities, and stressed personal unworthiness. The sometimes apocalyptic tone of prayers reflected the precarious character of life at the edges of the decaying empire. They tended to be free in their adaptations of prayers for local feasts and particular saints.

Different genres of books appeared to codify these developments in worship. Lectionaries were collections of scriptural readings, rationalized on the basis of the developing church year and the feasts of saints. As a genre of symbolic expression, they too note the theology and sensibility of particular churches. This replaced the continuous reading of the scriptures that Christians had in common with their Jewish ancestors. Sacramentaries appeared for the use of the person presiding; they collected the opening prayers, prayers over the gifts, eucharistic prayers, and conclusions, substituting for the earliest forms of spontaneous rhetoric (based no doubt on oral formulae). Songbooks (graduals) developed to provide singers with appropriate psalms for the seasons.

The coalescence of rites in the West with Rome as its norm owes as much to Charlemagne's (768-814) convictions about religious uniformity and public order as it does to the theology of the churchmen who served him. In 781, Charlemagne asked Pope Hadrian I (d. 795) for an authentic copy of the Roman liturgy to be used as a book to be copied in his realm. The volume arrived by 790. Alcuin revised the manuscript to fit usage north of the Alps with its more flowing rhetorical style. All other ritual usage was forbidden. Though it took some time, Alcuin's missal with some variations became the basis for Christian worship until the reformation in the 16th century.

The theology of the sacraments that Augustine (354-430) bequeathed to the Middle Ages included a strong emphasis upon the permanent effect of certain signs, the nourishing or assimilative dimension of the Eucharist, and the ways in which worship formed community in the present and anticipated the future reign of God. Consecratory prayers made a difference in the real world, whether in baptism (character) or in marriage or in the eucharist. His interpretation of signs (symbols), however, as indicating the past, and his realism about personal assimilation to Christ did not always cohere. Controversies in France during the 9th and 10th centuries asked exactly "what" was presented in the eucharist as distinct from baptism or anointing. What was the figure (signifier) and what the reality (signified)? The ecclesiastical tradition settled on the side of the realism of signs. The symbols effected redemption as a present reality, not simply as a reminder of a past event.

By the 10th century, the root metaphors that governed the amalgamated Roman rite were sacrificial, hieratic, hierarchical, and impersonal. Though the ritual of the eucharist began as table prayers over a meal, the memory of the sacrifice of Christ dominated Roman spirituality. The ritual of the eucharist was performed by a presider with his back to the congregants. His gestures and words were primarily directed to God and to the sacred instruments. If more than one minister was present, a carefully prescribed order of precedence was established. The often illiterate and undercatechized community were spectators at a sacred act. The sacral objects of consecrated bread and wine provided a permanent watchful presence for believers.

Thus, though we can speak of symbols inviting the baptized into the history of Christ and Christ's dominion over the universe, each rite in every age has established a rhetorical style that appeals to its own period and region. In a world in which rhetoric is determined by the norms of king and bishop, it is hardly surprising that Christian rituals should be established by and partake of the same hierarchical sensibilities.

Liturgical Styles in the West. The basic austerity of the Roman liturgy did not remain so. If we can speak of a "familial style" (with its house-churches and married church leaders) that marked the Apostolic Age and a "basilical style" (after the official buildings donated by Constantine to the early church) that succeeded it upon the legitimation of Christianity, we can mark the medieval developments as "monastic." Ecclesial architecture focused upon the development of an area for the community's daily recitation of the psalms. The hieratic character of sacrificial worship was distanced from a lay congregation by a lengthier nave and an elongated choir. Roodscreens distinguished the sanctuary of the clerics from the world of the lay people.

In the East, worship assumed a neo-Platonic cast. Taking a cue from the letter to the Hebrews about the way in which the high priest Christ has entered the Holy of Holies in eternity (Heb 4:14-9:28), theologians in the East described Christian worship as an icon of the heavenly liturgy where the angels are constantly praising their maker. Directions for the service itself (rubrics) began to be written to create this earthly mirror of a divine action.

In the West, worship took a peculiarly historical cast. In the 9th century, Amalarius of Metz (780-850) described the service catechetically as a mythic history of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection. The realism of the story shaped the symbolic gestures and objects. The profusion of liturgical directions that developed throughout the Middle Ages, though often local in their adaptation, obscured the straightforward apostolic structure of a service of readings, an offering of goods including bread and wine, a prayer of thanksgiving, and sharing of bread and wine.

Monastic, mendicant, and academic theologians tried during the Middle Ages to reform worship just as they tried to rethink theology. But little was accomplished until the crisis of the Protestant Reformers forced upon the Western churches a rethinking of their doctrines, theology, and symbols. In a very important sense, the two dimensions of Augustine's theory about signs (its realism of conveying meaning and its secondary signifying quality) divided into the two main branches of Christendom. Protestant Reformers, such as Luther, Calvin, or Zwingli, often miscalculated history and contemporary meaning as badly as the scholastic theologians they criticized. They focused upon the rememorative side of the Augustinian interpretation of signs. The Catholic revival settled on the other side: that of symbolic realism, participation, and the triumphal present.

While Protestant worshippers emphasized simplicity of dress, a minimum of gestures, images, and symbols in favor of the word as preached, 17th and 18th-century Catholic worship stressed elaborate ornament, decorative building, and polyphonous music. We might call it the development of an "operatic style" of symbolic expression. Worship was accomplished by professionals for spectators.

The church participated in 19th-century Romanticism by emphasizing its symbolic dimensions even more, turning worship into an evocation of mystery and uncanny silence through vestments, church bells, and incense. The rationalism of the 18th-century civic culture now past, the church shared in a sentimental cult of nature, an emphasis upon the affective in prayer, and the revival of things medieval. Idealized notions of the unity of architecture, worship, theology, and social concern won many Christians away from the harsh realities of industrializing economies in England, France, and the United States. The origins of the liturgical movement are in this romanticism of the medieval worship. Plainsong was revived; neo-gothic churches were built. A "romantic style" of symbolic worship was born.

Symbols in a Post-Modern Age. The world of modernity stressed subjective perspectives, historical origins, relativity of values, and the possibility, even probability, of cultural and political change. Contemporary industrialized bureaucracies and their socialist cognates have now moved from the sublime heights of romantic frenzy and the fearful despairs that accompanied them through the delights of modernity into its difficulties and even self-destructive impulses. No longer seduced by easy progress or consumerized productivity, citizens and believers now espouse an eclectic pluralism about the role, history, and function of symbols (whether in culture as a whole or within Christianity).

Believers have dual loyalties: to their religious traditions and to the integrity of their civil culture which develops with its own goals often unrelated to faith. This radical pluralism of allegiance has often placed believers in a position of eclectically choosing from the styles of past symbolic expressions. Thus one may move from one parish church with high monastic worship, including flowing gothic vestments, elaborate plainsong, incense, and visual mystification to a congregation that aggressively insists upon a familial, demotic style of worship. Communities that prefer Renaissance polyphony and hierarchically ordered ministers face pastors who want symbols that are more democratically decided and executed by parish liturgical committees. Cathedral liturgies, because of the very structure of the building, regularly demand a formal basilical style of worship, though the bishop himself might prefer a style much less formal.

Contemporary Questions. The search for a common contemporary symbolic style eludes the Christian communities, whether Catholic or Protestant. The questions: "What does it mean to be faithful to our tradition?" and "What does it mean to be loyal to our world?" are no longer luxuries of the theologian's or liturgist's workshop. Every Christian community is forced to define its own symbolic style or styles of worship to remain authentic to its traditions.

What does it mean to be faithful to modernity and its post-modern successors?

(a) The emergence of the modern sciences in the 17th and 18th centuries demystified space by making it possible to quantify the relationships of cause and effect. God may have been a remote cause of physical events; but the immediate causes could be isolated and measured. This permitted a control over nature. It also made experimental knowledge the criterion for all knowing. Symbolic ambivalences became suspect, particularly if they extended their meanings beyond the empirical realm.

Post-modern sciences, however, pay just as much attention to the particular without necessarily agreeing with the limitations placed upon human knowing. They recognize the metaphoric quality of models in science, the uncertainty of measurement, and the negative consequences of simply trying to control nature without respecting it. Being faithful to the insights of modern and post-modern science requires attention to particulars, respect for the sheer materiality of symbols, serious concern for the inner-worldly connections between things, and the honesty of responding with ignorance to inquiring questions to which one does not have a ready answer.

(b) Romantic poetry and philosophy taught modernity that all knowledge was filtered through the affective and cognitive subjectivity of the inquirer. Without the intricate interiority of the subject, there would be no science, no poetry, no common sense. Post-modern literature has discovered the solipsism of the ego, the overweening pride of the genius, and the psychological fragmentation of the subject. Post-modern philosophy has shown just how the mental acts of the subject are shaped by the common linguistic tradition and the culture of a people or nation. The subject has its own shadowside, its own "other," an ever-unconscious that dogs any attempts to schematize the conscious self. It has become clear that the subject is actually a community of subjects speaking a conversation in which any given action is the product of mixed motives and multiple understandings.

To be responsible for such a subject requires a subtlety of approach and the recognition of ambiguity. On the one hand, there is an attention to the development of the interior life and a discussion of the appropriate symbols that may express and shape the inner life at any given stage from children to the elderly. On the other, there is the recognition that symbols must challenge the subject to change. But the invitation to shift one's horizons by participating in another symbol cannot be accomplished brutally without destroying the delicate conversation of the heart.

(c) For the modern world since the revolutions in the United States and France, change is a value. Hierarchical uniformity and stability are destructive. The 19th-century human sciences knew themselves as radically historical, shaped by the passage of time. They recognized that the meanings of history were humanly constructed. And if they could be understood as made by humans, they could be unmade. Such a shaping of time was progress, leading toward a free world economy in which all who were deserving would enjoy a consumerist utopia.

This optimism about history was destroyed in the trenches of World War I, the genocides and holocaust of World War II, and the nuclear destruction that ended that war and threatens the present. Few would assume without considerable presumption that history's story is progressing toward the greatest good for the many. Post-modern human sciences are more conscious of their limitations.

Yet being faithful to the values of history means to be sensitive to change in the lives of individuals and communities. It means to be honest about the community's historical past and to anticipate judiciously the future without triumph, phalism. History can be seen as a treasure-house of warnings or of self-congratulating confirmations. In a post-modern world, it is neither. It is a world where the heroes and heroines of the past have flaws, where the saints could be obnoxious, and where heretics were often noble—because they were human.

(d) Finally, being faithful to modernity means recognizing that knowledge leads to action. Art-for-art's sake, worship for its own sake, knowledge-in-itself are all luxuries; they can shape and must lead to action. As Samuel Taylor Coleridge once remarked: "The metaphysics of one age is the common sense of the next." Risking a plan of action for the present and the future, however limited, however painfully formed, is part of the loyalty one owes modernity.

(e) There are escapes from modernity. Identification with a religious or a cultural past can be one, whether in a fundamentalism of the book or of doctrines. In effect, this option is a romanticism of the symbolic structures, hoping that repetition of the past will cure the pluralist ambiguities of the present. An alternate form of this problem is the apocalypticism that decries the present for the sake of the future. This can be a secular (nuclear winter; the greenhouse effect; the club of Rome) or a religious (Armageddon) apocalypse. The liberal option that tends to collapse all religious symbols into a creational optimism neglects the sometimes fearsome otherness of nature itself. Hurricanes, tornadoes, and solar windstorms are more uncontrollable than we pretend.

* What does it mean to be faithful to the Christian tradition?

(a) The primary symbol of Christian meaning is the life, death, and resurrection of Christ. Responsibility to that parabolic discourse requires the willingness to hear the dangerous memory that overturns cherished expectations, comforts the afflicted and the poor, and commits the community toward building the conditions for a better future. This person is the touchstone by which all other symbols are interpreted.

(b) The Christian tradition has a wealth of symbols and stories that have nourished its present. Being faithful to that tradition means allowing all those voices, especially those that have not had their day, to speak. An antecedent willingness to listen to the tradition can permit contemporary communities to "try on" old symbols to see if they have continuing power for change.

(c) The same attention must be given to the deeply felt interiority of the heroes and heroines of the tradition. The sanctoral cycle of the church year is not a luxury. It may require additions, subtractions, and contextualizations—but it can provide icons of identification for contemporary believers. Yet rather than emphasizing behavior (whether bizarre or ordinary), the community begins to see the interiority of religious ancestors.

(d) Emphasis upon the moral action that derives from symbolic expression makes it clear that Christian symbols are not for self-comforting, fragile psyches. Application is part of human understanding; if application is not included, the status quo is maintained and history is repeated. More of the same occurs. Those faithful to the death and resurrection of Jesus cannot claim to espouse a return to the way things were.

We may take David Tracy's notion of an analogical imagination as a guide in our attempts to develop a contemporary style of symbolic worship. It will be pluralist to recognize the many voices of the community; it will be conversational in the best sense, willing to listen, risking speech, and strengthening the interlocutors; it will be both affirming of our post-modern world and critical of its confusions. If it is pluralist, it will accept difference as enriching and struggle to discern which differences are morally and intellectually compatible, but it will not pre-judge the conclusions. It will seek out the suppressed voices in the tradition. If it is conversational, it is unlikely to tolerate speakers who stand on ceremonial office rather than competence. It will encourage people to speak their piece. If it is affirming, it will rejoice at the "signals of transcendence" in our world; if it is critical, it will correct as the gospels require.

This dialogical mode of imagination will look for the overlapping commonalities between Christianity and contemporary cultures and notice the accompanying differences. Because it is dialogical, it will be willing to converse about the dissymmetries; because it is imaginative, it will risk sympathy with the other in a willingness to view the world from another's perspectives. This risk to see the similarities in the differing expressions and to view the differences as participating in one another and creating a unity is the movement toward faith. But this faith is a firm conviction that the Christian God never ceases to be incarnate in symbolic forms.

See Traditions, liturgical . . . ; Liturgical time, theology of; Imagination and worship

M. Eliade, Images and Symbols (New York, 1961). T. Fawcett, The Symbolic Language of Religion (London, 1970). E.S. Goodenough, Jewish Symbols in the Graeco-Roman Period, ed. J. Neusner (Princeton, 1988). S. Happel (and James Walter), Conversion and Discipleship: A Christian Foundation for Ethics and Doctrine (Philadelphia, 1986): 85-101. C. Jones, G. Wainwright, E. Yarnold, et al., The Study of Liturgy (New York, 1978). B.J.F. Lonergan, Method in Theology (London, 1972): 57-99. L. Maldonado and D. Power, Symbol and Art in Worship (Edinburgh, 1980). D. Power, Unsearchable Riches: The Symbolic Nature of Liturgy (New York, 1984). K. Rahner, "The Theology of Symbol," Theological Investigations IV (Baltimore, 1966): 221-252. P. Ricoeur, Interpretation Theory: Discourse and the Surplus of Meaning (Fort Worth, 1976). E. Schillebeeckx, Christ the Sacrament of the Encounter with God (New York, 1963). J.L. Segundo, The Sacraments Today, Vol. 4 (New York, 1974). J. Shaughnessy, The Roots of Ritual (Grand Rapids, 1973). D. Tracy, The Analogical Imagination: Christian Theology and the Culture of Pluralism (New York, 1981). D. Tracy, Pluralism and Ambiguity: Hermeneutics, Religion, Hope (San Francisco, 1987).

STEPHEN HAPPEL

T

TECHNOLOGY

See Liturgy in a technological age; Media, use of, in the liturgy; Television, liturgy via

TELEVISION, LITURGY VIA

Liturgy is often defined as the work of the people; worship as the gathering of a community who join together around bread, book and cup to remember the Lord's Supper. In communication terms, liturgy could be defined as direct and interpersonal.

Mass media often defines its differences with other forms of communication because media, by its nature, demands that gatekeepers enter into the communication process. Therefore, the communication is indirect. The communication process between the source of messages in mass media and the receivers of those messages is normally separated by time and distance. For example, television performers do not receive feedback from their audiences as immediately as a pulpit preacher does.

Liturgy in McLuhan terms is information-laden and, therefore, a hot medium. Television in those same terms does not carry much information and, therefore, is a cool medium. It would seem, therefore, that liturgy in the form that Catholics normally celebrate it is a hot medium and not suitable for television, a cool medium.

These communications theories lead to a practical reality. The Catholic church's access to television airwaves, particularly in the United States, has been increasingly limited over the years because of government deregulation. The audience for free over-the-air television remains filled with people of numerous faith commitments. Many ministers who are actively engaged in the Catholic church's communications apostolate believe that the best use of the church's limited access to the airwaves for evangelization can be made when programs are produced and distributed that meet the needs of the largest number of people watching television. The broadcast of the Mass on over-the-air television, does not meet the criteria, since the Mass is designed for Catholic participation. Nonetheless, the Mass is oftentimes the only outreach a local church has for evangelization through television, and it continues to meet the need of the sick and shut-ins of particular local communities.

In the Constitution on Social Communications, the Second Vatican Council announced that the church "considers it one of its duties to announce the Good News of salvation . . . with the help of the media of social communications." The Fathers of the Council seemed clearly aware that the use of the media should take into account the "nature of what is communicated, given the special character of each of these media." It would seem then that Vatican II reinforces the theory that over-the-air television and the liturgy of the eucharist do not easily co-exist.

The Council Fathers further stated that care must be taken that television and radio programs created by church agencies "... are outstanding for their standards of excellence and achievement." The demand for excellence is clear. That the eucharistic liturgy is presented on television is a fact. Therefore, liturgy presented on television should be both good liturgy, and good television.

Good liturgy binds a people together, gives them a shared sense of community, and reminds them of God's presence in their lives. Liturgy does that by bringing diverse elements into a single whole. God's word carefully spoken, music that inspires, vessels crafted artistically, vestments of substance and style, a celebrant who understands his role as presider, a preacher who grabs people's attention—each of these elements when brought together with God's grace and among a believing people produces liturgies, the work of the people.

Good television is intimate, and eucharistic liturgy offers television cameras the possibility of intimacy at many points in the action. Television offers liturgical actions in close up form that are difficult to see even in a well-built and well-lighted sacred space. When a homily is shot with an eye to intimacy, for example, television offers preachers the chance to use the power of their eyes and the expressions on their face that are often missed in a large church. The intimacy of liturgy as seen by television is, therefore, a plus. There are many minuses.

Television broadcasts are bound by time. The constraints of time must be observed, but the current common practice of allowing under thirty minutes for the celebration of the liturgy strains the ability of the celebrant and those assisting him to create meaningful liturgy.

Whenever possible, to save money, it seems that most television liturgies are shot in studios. However, television liturgies should be live. The setting should be in a church rather than a studio since it is almost impossible to create a fitting sacred space in a studio.

Television is usually watched by one or two people at a time. The ability of television to create a community—one of the key characteristics of good liturgy—is, therefore, not likely to occur. However, there is a sense in which those who watch the liturgy on television become a community bound by the common bond of television. Just as a nation can be bound together by television during a crisis such as John Kennedy's assassination, so also can a group of people watching television discretely be bound together by the liturgical events they witness on television.

The advent of television as a medium whose audiences are segmented, rather than a mass medium, will make it possible for larger numbers of Catholics to view liturgies on television whether watching their videotape players, cable free television, or direct broadcast satellites. Because the number of "windows" to audiences will increase in the future, those who wish to create eucharistic liturgies for television viewing will have an easier time finding an audience. But those increased number of "windows" to the audience may well prove to viewers that the elements that create successful worship, particularly participation in a community, are still beyond the reach of mass media, especially television.

See Communication, ritual as; Imagination and worship; Media, use of, in the liturgy

JOHN GEANEY, C.S.P.

THEOLOGIANS, MODERN, AND LITURGICAL RENEWAL

The modern liturgical renewal would not have been possible without the contributions of many prominent theologians such as A. Baumstark, J. Betz, L. Bouyer, Y. Congar, J. Danielou, M. de la Taille, B. Leeming, O. Semmelroth, P. Schoonenberg, and C. Vagaggini. Other theologians, such as J. Corbon, A. Kavanagh, E. Kilmartin, B. Lonergan, D. Power, J. L. Segundo, R. Vaillancourt, and G. Wainwright have opened up new possibilities for the liturgical theology of the future. But the theologians who have had the greatest impact on the renewal of liturgical thought and practice in the 20th century are unquestionably Odo Casel, Edward Schillebeeckx and Karl Rahner. These scholars completely reshaped our understanding of the liturgy through their insights into mystery theology, Christ as sacrament, the church as sacrament, the universality of grace, grace as self-communication of God, and the nature of symbols.

I. Odo Casel

No theologian had a more profound and indelible impact on the modern liturgical renewal than Odo Casel (1886-1948), a German Benedictine of the abbey at Maria Laach. Based on his studies in the patristic period, Casel developed a refreshing understanding of the liturgy as the mystery of Christ made present. Casel's work stimulated a flurry of scholarly activity as a wide variety of theologians returned to their sources to debate the merits and demerits of his approach. In the process, some of the details of his approach were rejected, particularly his interpretation of the relationship between Christian liturgy and the mystery cults of late antiquity. Some scholars found his exegesis of the scriptures and the Fathers somewhat nonchalant. His exposition of just how in fact the mystery of Christ was present in the mystery of worship left most theologians unsatisfied. He was also criticized for having an excessively romantic view of the church's liturgical practice. Nevertheless, his core insights won enthusiastic acceptance and are now largely taken for granted. Whereas Josef Jungmann led the liturgical movement to the historical perspective required to renew the liturgy, Odo Casel was the first to inspire it with the necessary theological vision.

Casel summarized his insights in a collection of writings which appeared in English in 1962 entitled The Mystery of Christian Worship. This book has since become a theological classic. Casel sees Christianity as a mystery and the liturgy as that mystery made present. "Mystery" for Casel is not what we normally mean by it, i.e., a truth inaccessible to human reason. It is originally and primarily God himself as the infinitely distant, holy, unapproachable one. This God reveals himself as mystery to those whom he has chosen. His revelation remains a mystery because it is not open to the profane world but hides itself and shows itself only to believers.

The incarnation gave the word "mystery" a second and deeper meaning. Christ is the mystery in person because he shows the invisible God in the flesh. But the mystery of Christ is not just his person. His life, death, resurrection and exaltation are mysteries because God reveals his glory through them in a unique and unsurpassable way. The paschal mystery, the passing of Christ from life in the flesh to a risen life with the Father in the Spirit, is the center of the mystery of Christ.

Salvation means that what was realized in Christ must be realized in us. Being a Christian does not mean just that we accept the teaching of Christ and receive the grace won by him. It means a real participation in the very saving acts that constitute the mystery of Christ. Therefore the past mystery of Christ must be made present so that we can enter into it and relive it in an openness to Christ.

This participation in the mystery of Christ takes place in the liturgy. For Casel the liturgy makes present the unique, unrepeatable mystery of Christ which was realized historically in the past and is sacramentally re-presented in the liturgical commemoration. The liturgy itself, therefore, is a mystery. Thus "mystery" has a third sense, intimately connected with the first two. As mystery, it is the revelation of God in the redeeming work of the risen Lord through the sacred actions which Christ appointed for the church. As liturgy, it is the action of the church in conjunction with the saving action of Christ. Christ and the church work together inseparably in the mystery of worship.

Although Christ is no longer visible among us, we encounter him and his saving deeds, and through him the mystery of God, in the mystery of the liturgy. The revelation of the mystery of God in Christ is carried on and made present in the mystery of worship. Here Christ performs his saving work, invisible but present in the Spirit and acting upon people of faith. Christ himself acts in this mystery; not alone as he did in the mystery of the cross, but with the church. When the church celebrates the liturgy, Christ is at work in it and so what the church does is truly mystery. The mystery of the liturgy is, therefore, the most central and most essential action of the church.

Consequently, Casel stressed the importance of the full and active participation of the entire assembly in the liturgy. The whole church, not merely the clergy, is to take an active part in the liturgy. All members are sacramentally joined to Christ through baptism and confirmation. The laity do not merely assist with private devotion and prayer at the clergy's liturgy. Rather, by their membership in the body of Christ they are necessary and real participants in the liturgy. All are meant to actually participate in the mystery of Christ.

II. Edward Schillebeeckx

Edward Schillebeeckx (b. 1914), a Dutch Dominican, has written extensively on sacramental questions. In the process he successfully translated the key insights of scholastic sacramental theology into contemporary philosophical terms. His most influential work in this regard appeared in English in 1963 as Christ the Sacrament of the Encounter with God.

Schillebeeckx thought that the traditional theology of the manuals did not adequately distinguish the unique manner of existence which is peculiar to human persons from the mere "being there" which is proper to impersonal things. Thus, this theology did not do justice to the personal communion with God which is the center of Christianity. The sacraments were studied with a purely impersonal, almost mechanical approach in which they were considered chiefly in terms of physical categories.

Schillebeeckx based his study of the sacraments on a highly nuanced concept of human, personal encounter. He understands Christianity as a saving dialogue between humanity and the living God. Christianity, therefore, is essentially a personal encounter with God. Because God lovingly takes the initiative and comes to meet us in grace, we live in a condition of active and immediate communication with God. Grace is this "indwelling" of God, the communion of God the Trinity and human persons. This act of encounter with God, which can take place only in faith, is what we call salvation.

Jesus Christ is the supreme realization of this encounter with God. He is himself a personal dialogue with God the Father and the whole human community. There are two movements to this dialogue. In Christ's love for human beings there is a movement down from above, a coming to us of God's love by way of Jesus's human heart. And there is a movement up from below, from the human heart of Jesus to the Father. The human actions of Jesus' life as they come from above bring redemption to his fellow human beings. As coming from below, they are expressions of his worship of the Father. Thus Jesus is not only the revelation of the redeeming God; he is also the supreme worshipper of the Father, the supreme realization of the encounter with God. The actions of Jesus' life, therefore, are manifestations both of the divine love for humanity and of human love for God. They are both bestowal of grace and worship.

Since the humanity of Jesus represents us all, it is clear that Jesus is not only the visible offer of divine love to humanity. He is also the supreme realization of the response of human love to this divine offer. Whatever Christ does as a free human being is not only a realization in human form of God's activity for our salvation. It is also at the same time the positive human acceptance, representative for all of us, of this redeeming offer from God.

For Schillebeeckx, therefore, Jesus as the personal, visible realization of the Father's redeeming grace is the sacrament, the primordial sacrament, of the encounter with God. Encounter with Jesus is therefore the sacrament of encounter with God. The foundation of all this is the incarnation, which in turn was completed by Jesus' death, resurrection and exaltation. This mystery of Christ is a mystery of saving worship: a mystery of praise (the upward movement) and of salvation (the downward movement). Christ is supreme worship of the Father. Christ lived this worship of God in a completely human way in the course of an ordinary human life.

The supreme moment in his life, the death to which he freely assents, is "liturgical." The death on the cross, as that in which Jesus' inward adoration of God becomes an external reality is an act of the community (i.e., a liturgy), not yet performed by the people itself but offered by the representative of the whole human family in the name of all and to the advantage of all. The cross itself is the great liturgical mystery of worship through which Christ pleads with the Father for the grace of redemption for the world. In and through the liturgical mystery of worship that is his sacrifice on the cross, against the background of the whole of his life in God's service, the being of the Son of God as "from the Father" and "to the Father" is fully revealed and given reality on the human plane.

Through this earthly mystery of worship, Christ "merited" or obtained for us from the Father the grace of redemption which now as risen Lord he can in fact give us to the full. The heavenly liturgy of Christ is still a filial intercession with and worship of the Father, but it is also a continual sending out of the Holy Spirit upon humanity. Hence the mystery of worship which is Christ is at the same time our salvation. It is a mystery of saving worship.

Christ's earthly and heavenly mystery of worship, then, is the foundation of the Lord's unfailing gift of redeeming grace. When we speak of Christ's mystery of saving worship or about his work of salvation-through-worship, we must not lose sight of the fact that Jesus' human adoration of the Father is itself the revelation of the divinity which he receives from the Father. This adoration arises therefore from God's own love. For Jesus this means that even his adoration itself is a pure gift and grace from the Father without whom he can do nothing. Our salvation through Jesus' adoration is thus intelligible only by virtue of the fact that Jesus as human was himself sanctified by the Spirit of God; the redeeming activity of Jesus' love is a personal worship-through-salvation, and so in our regard salvation-through-worship.

The personal encounter with God which is our salvation remains bound up with our personal encounter with Christ. We encounter that mystery of Christ in the church's sacramental liturgy. The sacraments are not things; they are personal encounters with the risen Lord, the primordial sacrament of encounter with God. Through the sacraments we are placed in living contact with the mystery of Christ's saving worship.

The sacraments are such a living encounter with the mystery of Christ because the church, which the sacraments express and make visible, is the sacrament of the risen Lord. The church is the historical manifestation of God's own love for humanity in Christ (bestowal of grace) and, at the same time, of humanity's own love and adoration of God in the same Lord (worship). In this way the church is a community of salvation and worship and the embodiment of the mystery of Christ. It is the primordial sacrament of Christ.

The sacraments are fundamentally and primarily visible, official acts of the church. Since the church is the primordial sacrament of encounter with Christ, each sacrament is a personal saving act of the risen Christ himself realized in the visible form of an act of the church. To participate in the sacraments of the church in faith is, therefore, the same thing as to encounter Christ. This is what Casel pointed to in his concept of "mystery presence." Schillebeeckx' contribution has been to show that the presence of Christ in mystery stems from the fact that the sacraments are personal acts of Christ in the church.

III. Karl Rahner

Karl Rahner (1904-84), a German

Jesuit, had a more extensive influence on the renewal of Roman Catholic theology in general, and on the renewal of the liturgy in particular, than any other modern theologian. He criticized the conventional sacramental theology of his day for presenting the liturgy as the means through which grace is made available to a world which is otherwise normally deprived of it. He proposed a different view, in which the liturgy of the church is seen as the symbolic manifestation of the "liturgy of the world," i.e., the dynamic process of God's continual self-communication to the world and our response. Rahner built this idea of worship on his key insights into theological anthropology, the theology of grace, salvation history, Christology and ecclesiology.

Worship presupposes that we finite creatures are able to enter into a dialogical relationship with the infinite mystery of God. Rahner claims that a fundamental openness to such a relationship with God is the essence of what it means to be human.

It is precisely because we have a transcendental openness to the absolute mystery of God that we know anything, that we are free and responsible, and that we are persons and subjects. To be human is to be fundamentally and completely open to unfathomable mystery. Our transcendental orientation can be suppressed or ignored but it is always present as a condition of possibility of our subjectivity.

Thus our experience of ordinary daily life presupposes a relationship with God. And our relationship with the absolutely transcendent God is mediated by daily human life. When we direct ourselves to the explicit worship of God, we are not entering into a relationship with God as though none had existed previously. On the contrary, when we worship, the relationship with that unfathomable mystery which is a secret ingredient of every moment of our daily lives is expressed and manifested. Furthermore, it should not be surprising that our relationship with the transcendent God in worship is mediated by the particular and the historical: by material objects like water, oil, bread and wine, by word and song, by symbol and ritual. Our experience of anything historical is always also an experience of God, and our experience of God is always mediated by the historical. We are transcendent beings precisely as historical beings, a fact which receives special expression in worship.

The liturgy presupposes that we do not merely relate to God as a distant and aloof horizon of mystery, but that in fact when we worship we experience a God who is near to us and transforms us in grace. The fundamental tenet of Rahner's theology of grace is that grace is properly understood not as the communication of a finite created gift separate from God, but as the self-communication of God. God does not merely give us some indirect share of himself in grace by creating and giving us finite realities through efficient causality. Rather, in something which approaches formal causality, God really and in the strictest sense of the word gives himself.

In grace, therefore, the absolute, holy mystery which is experienced as the horizon of our transcendence is communicated to us while remaining absolute mystery. Through this self-communication we participate in the life of God; we are transformed and become like God without, however, becoming God. Such a transformation is the fulfillment of our deepest human potential and our salvation.

The world is always encompassed and permeated with this grace of the divine self-communication at least as an offer made to our freedom. The world as it actually exists is never simply a secular and profane reality to which grace is subsequently added by God. It is always graciously endowed with God's self-communication and oriented to God. The objective situation in which we live is one in which God wills the salvation of everyone. God continually offers himself to us, but that offer can become effective and fruitful for salvation when it is freely accepted in faith.

All of this means that liturgy is not fundamentally about an exchange of gifts between ourselves and God. It is not a matter of God giving us some-thing called grace. Worship is an experience of grace and so it is an experience of the immediate presence of the absolute mystery of God mediated by the historical. But God is not present to us in worship as though he were otherwise absent from our lives; we are always and everywhere in the gracious presence of God. The ways in which the unfathomable mystery is present in worship are different from the ways God is present in daily life, but God is graciously present in both. And this gracious self-communication of God never becomes fruitful and effective inside or outside of worship unless it is actively accepted in faith.

The historical mediations of the offer of God's saving self-revelation and our response to it take place not only in specifically religious events but in a hidden and ambiguous way in every event of our lives. Perfectly common and ostensibly "profane" experiences mediate the gracious self-revelation of the unfathomable mystery of God. The entire range of human endeavors can mediate our response to God. For Rahner, life cannot be divided into mutually exclusive secular and sacred spheres. There is no such thing as a purely secular realm lying alongside or below a purely sacred realm which is made up of religious and sacramental events. The realm of events and realities which are explicitly sacred lies within a secular realm which is itself permeated by the effective grace of God. The history of salvation and revelation, therefore, is co-extensive with the ordinary history of the world.

The dynamic process of God's gracious self-communication and our response, which takes place throughout the routine course of human life, is usually hidden and ambiguous. The official history of salvation is nothing more or less than the way in which that history of salvation and grace which pervades our lives and extends throughout our history becomes explicit and historically tangible. In Jesus Christ, this special history of salvation reached its final, irrevocable highpoint and fulfillment.

Jesus Christ, in whom God's absolute self-communication to the whole human race is present both as offer and acceptance, is the unsurpassable and definitive offer and acceptance of God because he is not only established by God but is God himself. The very meaning of human nature is to be realized and fulfilled by being filled with the mystery of God. When our indefinable nature was assumed by God as his self-expression it reached its fulfillment. The incarnate Word of God fulfills the essential transcendental openness which always orients us to God. He completely realizes our potential to receive the absolute self-communication of God.

The death and resurrection of the incarnate Word is the ultimate manifestation of his fulfillment of salvation history. The life of Jesus Christ was summed up and finalized in his death on the cross and then ratified in his resurrection from the dead. In Christ, God has communicated himself in such a unique way that Christ became the definitive and irreversible self-gift of God to the world. Christ freely accepted the divine self-gift in such a manner that this acceptance too became irreversible, i.e., through his death and resurrection as the definitive culmination of his free actions in history. The cross and resurrection, therefore, are the primary sacramental sign of the universal availability of saving grace. Thus Jesus Christ is the original sacrament of the salvation of the world.

For Rahner, then, the ordinary and "profane" history of the world is the stage on which takes place the continual drama of the self-communication of God and our response to it, a drama which reached its highpoint and fulfillment in the incarnation, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. This is what he meant by "the liturgy of the world." Worship manifests the holiness of our lives and our world for we worship from within a graced and redeemed world. It is precisely because our worship takes place in such a world, because it is the symbolic manifestation of this liturgy of the world, that it is an event of grace for us. Worship expresses the limitless grace of God and thus makes that grace available to us. The liturgy of the church is best understood as the symbolic expression of the liturgy of the world.

The necessity of worship does not depend upon the supposition that it alone provides us with a grace that is otherwise unavailable in a fallen world, for that is patently not the case. It derives, on the one hand, from our need to express our hidden, implicit relationship with God and, on the other, from our responsibility to take advantage of those explicit ways in which the eschatologically triumphant fulfillment of this relationship in Christ have been made available to us in the liturgy of the church. Worship is important and significant not because something happens in it that does not happen elsewhere but because there is present and explicit in it that which makes the world important: that it is everywhere blessed by gracious and triumphant self-communication of God.

The liturgy of the world, and therefore all true worship, is first and foremost something that God celebrates. God freely chose to communicate himself and so God created a world and listeners within it who could receive and hear his word. This liturgy takes place at the initiative of God; it is all grace. Even our response is made possible and effected by God, for it is precisely in the freedom of which God is the source that we are empowered to respond to God. But while worship is at heart something that God brings about in us, it nonetheless takes place in and through our free history. The self-communication of God is directed toward our freedom, a real freedom which is made possible by God. God sustains our freedom in such a way that we really do have the possibility of accepting or rejecting God's self-gift. We shape this free response in all the concrete, ordinary events of our lives. It is impossible for us to be passive spectators in the liturgy of the world; the gracious initiatives of God demand our response. Active response and participation is something that is required of us at all levels of worship.

For Rahner, the church's worship is not merely a manifestation of the liturgy of the world. Rather, it is the expression of the liturgy which is co-extensive with the history of the world and which has been fulfilled in Christ Jesus. The liturgy of the church is the clearest and most effective symbolic expression of the liturgy of the world.

The liturgy of the world is necessarily directed toward the kind of social and public expression that it finds in the liturgy of the church. We participate in the liturgy of the world as social beings and if the symbolic expression of that liturgy is to be complete it must take a social form. Communal worship is necessary and essential because only it can express the fact that the liturgy of the world embraces our lives as social beings.

The church's communal worship is a unique expression of the liturgy of the world due to the church's distinctive relationship to Christ. The church is what Rahner calls a "real symbol" of the risen Christ: it remains distinct from what it symbolizes, but is the way in which Christ expresses himself and renders himself present in the world. The church is the basic sacrament of Christ, the highpoint and fulfillment of the liturgy of the world. As this sacrament the church is brought to manifestation on the historical and social levels and thereby "effects" that grace which is already present in the innermost heart of the world and of the whole of human life. It is the historical realization of the fundamental liturgical drama which lies at the center of the world and its history.

The church, then, is the permanent presence in the world of the fulfillment of the liturgy of the world. This relationship to Christ distinguishes the church's liturgy from every other kind of worship. When the church celebrates its liturgy, it celebrates it as the community of faith through which the highpoint of the liturgy of the world is permanently present. This is why Rahner calls the church the basic sacrament. The church symbolically expresses the liturgy of the world in an absolutely unique fashion. The individual sacramental worship activities of the church are the occasions in which the church concretely expresses its nature as the basic, ongoing manifestation of the liturgy of the world. The abiding, indestructible union of the church with Christ is manifested whenever the church celebrates its sacraments. And so the sacramental liturgy of the church is the clearest and most effective symbolic manifestation of the liturgy of the world.

Conclusion

Casel, Schillebeeckx, and Rahner were not the only modern theologians to make significant contributions to the liturgical renewal. Nor have all of their ideas stood the test of time equally well. But by giving new life to some ancient theological insights they completely reshaped the way we understand worship. By the beginning of this century, it was clear to many that the liturgical practice of the church was badly in need of renewal. Historians showed the movement how and why the liturgy should be renewed by investigating its historical development. Theologians like Casel, Schillebeeckx, and Rahner made an enormous impact on the movement by providing it with bold new visions of the place of the liturgy within the mystery of our life in God. One measure of their impact is that today so many of their insights are taken for granted. But perhaps their most enduring accomplishment is that they have inspired a whole new generation of theologians to develop other, fresh perspectives on the liturgy.

See Mystery theology

Odo Casel, The Mystery of Christian Worship (Westminster: The Newman Press, 1962). Edward Schillebeeckx, Christ the Sacrament of the Encounter with God (New York: Sheed and Ward, 1963). Karl Rahner, The Church and the Sacraments (New York: Herder and Herder, 1963); "Considerations on the Active Role of the Person in the Sacramental Event," Theological Investigations Vol. 14 (New York: Seabury, 1976): 161-84; "On the Theology of Worship," Theological Investigations Vol. 19 (New York: Crossroad, 1983): 141-49; and, "The Theology of the Symbol," Theological Investigations Vol. 4 (Baltimore: Helicon, 1966): 221-52.

MICHAEL SKELLEY, S.J.

THERAPY, RECONCILIATION AND

See Reconciliation and therapy

TIME, LITURGICAL

See Calendar, liturgical; Liturgical time, theology of

TRADITIONS, LITURGICAL, IN THE EAST

The distinction within the ecumenical church between the churches of the East and the churches of the West is rooted in patterns of evangelization and evolution in the first six centuries of the Christian

Era. As Christianity spread beyond Jerusalem to the whole Mediterranean world, four regions, in addition to Jerusalem, became major centers of Christian life: North Africa (Carthage), Rome, Antioch and Alexandria, each developing its own distinctive forms of faith and prayer.

These initial centers had varying fates. Jerusalem was destroyed in A.D. 70. The church of North Africa, where Latin Christianity was born and developed [Tertullian (d. ca. A.D. 240), Cyprian (d. A.D. 258)], was destroyed by the Moors in the 7th century, but not before exerting a major influence on the church of Rome. This latter (Rome) evolved in three stages: a primitive apostolic stage (Clement of Rome (fl. ca. A.D. 80); a developed Greek stage (Hippolytus of Rome (d. A.D. 235), and, in the fourth century, Latin Rome (usually taken to be the Roman tradition) which adopted as its own, and further evolved, the Latin Christianity of North Africa. The church of Alexandria developed for a time as the major intellectual center [Clement (d. A.D. 215), Origen (d. A.D. 253/254), Athanasius (d. A.D. 373) and Cyril (d. A.D. 444)] until the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451), which Alexandria rejected. Alexandria is also known for its monastic movement, which likewise had an effect on its evolving liturgical forms. The Antiochene influence was felt throughout Asia Minor with the churches of Cappadocia [Basil of Caesarea (d. A.D. 379), Gregory of Nazianz (d. A.D. 389) and Gregory of Nyssa (d. A.D. 394)] helping further to shape both theological and liturgical evolution. Finally, from the late 4th century onward, the new imperial capital at Constantinople began to emerge as yet another major Christian center, under whose influence the later Byzantine church, still Antiochene in root, would develop its own distinctive liturgical forms.

The term liturgical tradition, as it is employed here, refers to these five centers (Jerusalem, Rome, Carthage, Antioch and Alexandria), the forms of faith and prayer characteristic of each, and the forward evolution of these forms in the many churches that constitute the one church of Jesus Christ. Though there are countless instances of mutual influence, one tradition on another, it can generally be said that the Latin tradition (Carthage and, especially, Latin Rome) is the root tradition of the churches of the West, while the Syriac and Greek traditions (Jerusalem, Antioch and Alexandria) form the root traditions of the churches of the East.

Because of the early disappearance of the Jerusalem church, the churches to be considered here as liturgical traditions of the East are derived from either Antioch or Alexandria. The Jerusalem tradition was absorbed into certain strains of Antioch Christianity and no longer exists as an independent living liturgical tradition. Antioch gave rise to an East Syrian strain manifest in the Nestorian and Chaldean churches of Iran and Iraq and in the Malabar church in India, and a West Syrian strain which appears in several layers of evolution. In its most primitive form it shows itself in the Syrian (monophysite and Catholic) and Maronite churches of the Middle East, and in the Orthodox and Malankara churches of India. In more complex and developed form it appears in the Byzantine churches and also in the Armenian church, which has been significantly influenced by other traditions (e.g., Cappadocia and Rome) as well. The two primary manifestations of the Alexandrian tradition are the Coptic church in Egypt and, though again with a variety of secondary influences (esp. West Syrian), the national church of Ethiopia.

The primary focus here will be on these traditions as they exist in living churches today. Since sacraments in the East are treated elsewhere, the focus is further restricted to the eucharistic liturgy. The aim is to examine each of these ritual forms and uncover the distinctive theology and spirituality which they contain.

All of the churches follow the standard ritual pattern where proclamation of the word precedes and leads into the sacramental offering. It is the general Eastern custom to prepare the bread and wine for offering at the beginning of the liturgy, and it is a common understanding in the East that these gifts somehow already represent Christ even before the consecratory anaphora or eucharistic prayer. In many of the churches the ancient custom of conducting the first part of the liturgy from the bema (raised platform for the celebration of the word) and away from the altar is being restored. Except in cases where Western influence imposed otherwise, these churches generally use leavened bread and distribute the eucharistic wine by intinction, by spoon, or directly from the chalice. Some of the liturgies, notably the Byzantine and the Armenian, and to some extent the Coptic, are space dependent; others less so, or not at all.

East Syrian Churches: Nestorian, Chaldean and Malabar The Churches

Antioch was the original center of Syrian Christianity, with a second center developing by the end of the 2nd century in Edessa. Edessa itself became divided by early christological disputes between Monophysites (one person, one nature in Christ) and Nestorians (two persons, two natures in Christ), and soon political pressure drove the Nestorians further east into the Persian Empire.

The Nestorian church was centered at Nisibis and organized as a distinct church in the 4th century by the bishop of Seleucia-Ctesiphon. Because it developed outside of the Roman Empire, it did so with a large measure of independence from what it called "the churches of the West" (i.e., everything to the west of itself). The Nestorian church preserves a very primitive layer of liturgical evolution.

These East Syrian Christians adhered to the decrees of Nicea, but not to those of Ephesus or Chalcedon, and eventually they adopted Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. A.D. 428), who was condemned by the Chalcedonian churches, as their champion theologian. From the 4th to the 7th centuries they engaged in great missionary activity throughout the East. The rise of Islam, however, put a stop to their missionary expansion, cut the mission territories (see Malabar church below) off from the mother church, and left the Nestorian church but a remnant community living peaceably, if under severe restrictions, among the Moslems. Since the 16th century some have been united to the church of Rome, these being the Catholic Chaldeans, while others remain non-Chalcedonian Nestorians.

The Malabar church, also called St. Thomas Christians because they claim Thomas the apostle as their link to the apostolic church, came under the missionary influence of the Persian Nestorians until they were cut off from them by the advance of Islam. The St. Thomas Christians were re-discovered in the 16th century by Portuguese missionaries who tried unsuccessfully to impose the Latin liturgy upon them. These missionaries did succeed, however, in heavily Latinizing the Malabar liturgy, a deed which has only recently been undone. Liturgical revisions begun in 1962 have restored the Malabar eucharist to its Syro-Chaldean form, and translated it from Syriac into modern Malayalam.

The liturgy of the Nestorian, Chaldean and Malabar churches is essentially the same. The primary anaphora (eucharistic prayer) is that of Sts. Addai and Mari, which is unique in that no words of institution are to be found in it. These words are inserted in the text by the Catholic Chaldeans and Malabarese. Two other prayers are also found in the tradition, one attributed to Nestorius and one to Theodore of Mopsuestia, though these are used only occasionally by the Nestorians and Chaldeans, and not at all by the Malabar church. These prayers do contain the institution narrative in its proper place, which makes its absence from the Addai-Mari text, in spite of great efforts to prove otherwise, most probably a simple absence rather than a reasoned omission.

The text cited to examine the East Syrian liturgical tradition as it lives today is the revised text of the Syro-Malabar church (see, Celebration of the Eucharist according to the Syro-Malabar Rite, Bangalore: Biblical, Catechetical and Liturgical Centre, 1973). Differences between this and the Chaldean liturgy are noted. The major differences between the Chaldean and Nestorian liturgies are the saints who are called upon in the prayers and, of course, the insertion of the institution narrative in the Addai-Mari text.

The Liturgy

(a) Introductory Rites. The introductory rites of the liturgy are remnants of a monastic office. They consist of an abbreviated doxology ("Glory to God in the highest and to all on earth, peace and hope forever"), the Lord's Prayer, a variable psalm and a prayer of incense, which concludes with the lakhoumara, a 4th century prayer of praise to Christ the Lord. The gifts are prepared in the Chaldean rite simply, and before the liturgy begins; in the Malabar rite the offerings are prepared during the pre-anaphora, after the celebrants have come to the altar. In an earlier version of both rites, the gifts were prepared more formally between the lakhoumara and the trisagion.

(b) Liturgy of the Word. The liturgy of the word begins with the trisagion ("Holy God, holy strong one, holy and immortal, have mercy on us") and consists of two

(Malabar) or four (Chaldean) readings. A homily, prayer of the faithful (Malabar), and creed conclude this part of the liturgy. An earlier version of both rites concluded with an imposition of hands and blessing of the people, and probably the dismissal of catechumens as well.

(c) Pre-anaphora. The pre-anaphora includes the "access to the altar" by the celebrant(s), transfer of the gifts (if prepared elsewhere) or their presentation and preparation.

(d) Anaphora. The anaphora or Qurbana of the Apostles (Addai and Mari) follows. The anaphora includes more than the eucharistic prayer alone. It begins with a prayer of gratitude on the part of the ministers ("...through the multitude of your mercies, you have made us worthy to be ministers of the sacred mysteries of the body and blood of your Christ. . ."), the greeting of peace, the unveiling of the gifts (the veil is folded and placed around the gifts to represent the sepulchre of Christ), and the incensing of the gifts. After the customary dialogue, the eucharistic prayer gives thanks to God for creation, leads into the "Holy, Holy, Holy," and continues in thanksgiving for the incarnation and redemption. At this point the narrative of institution is inserted.

There follows the prayer of remembrance (anamnesis), prayers of intercession (it is characteristic of the East-Syrian tradition to locate the intercessions here), the invocation of the Spirit (epiclesis) and the concluding doxology.

(e) Post-anaphora. At the conclusion of the anaphora, priest and people proclaim faith in the living and life-giving bread of heaven. The bread is broken and signed with the precious blood. The people are invited to "approach the mysteries of the precious body and blood of our savior" with an invitation as well to "turn away from our faults." A litany prayer for forgiveness and the Lord's prayer (a second time) lead into the distribution of communion to all. This is followed by a brief thanksgiving prayer, blessing and dismissal.

Theology and Spirit

The over-all tone of the Syro-Chaldean liturgy is one of glory and praise to God. This doxological note is set at the very beginning with the "Glory to God" and the Lord's Prayer. It continues in the prayer that concludes the psalm ("For all the helps and graces you have given us, for which we cannot thank you enough, we will praise and glorify you unceasingly in your triumphant church forever") and in the lakhoumara ("You, Jesus Christ, we glorify; you are the one who raises our bodies and you are the savior of our souls"). After the trisagion, and before the first reading, the presiding priest prays "that love and hope may grow in us, that we may find salvation, and praise you forever." Before the gospel: "O Christ, Light of the world and Life of all, glory forever to the eternal Mercy that sent you to us." In coming to the altar, the priests pray: "We give you thanks, our Father, Lord of heaven and earth, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, for though we are sinners, you have made us worthy by your grace to offer you these holy, glorious, life-giving and divine mysteries. . . ." A prayer of praise introduces the greeting of peace ("We offer you praise and honor, worship and thanksgiving now and always and forever"), and again the fraction rite ("Glory be to your name, O Lord Jesus Christ, and worship to your Majesty forever"). Finally, the concluding prayers and blessing continue this theme to the end: "It is our duty, O Lord, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, to offer always to your most Blessed Trinity praise and honor, worship and perpetual thanksgiving. . . ." and "Let us sing the praises of Christ who has nourished us with his body and blood."

The liturgy is heavily christocentric. While many of the prayers are addressed to the triune God or simply to the Father, many more are addressed directly to Christ himself. Even within the anaphora, a prayer most often addressed exclusively to the Father, the section on redemption is addressed to Christ.

The East Syrian liturgy is a remembrance that looks forward to the eschaton rather than to the past (the Lord's Supper) or present (this eucharistic offering or the heavenly mysteries as they are now being enacted). This is captured most forcefully in the epiclesis of the Addai-Mari anaphora: "let your Holy Spirit come and rest upon this oblation of your servants; may he bless it and sanctify it that it may be unto the pardon of our offenses and forgiveness of our sins, and for the hope of resurrection and for the new life with the just in the kingdom of heaven."

Finally, the East Syrian liturgy exhibits a theological note derived from Theodore of Mopsuestia who considered the bread and wine, once placed upon the altar and before the invocation of the Spirit, to represent Christ in the tomb, with the epiclesis itself signifying the resurrection. Once the gifts are prepared, the veil is folded around them "as a sepulchre" and is not removed until after the epiclesis.

The Addai-Mari anaphora has several distinctive marks. In addition to being in part addressed to Christ, the intercessions are placed between the anamnesis and epiclesis, and therefore form part of the offering itself. The anamnesis is untypical in that, while it does commemorate the "passion, death, burial and resurrection" (no mention is made in the anamnesis of the future coming of Christ), it does not lead into the offering of the gifts, but only to the more general offering of "praise and honor, worship and thanksgiving." Finally, the institution narrative, where it is inserted by the Catholic Chaldeans and Malabarese, is in fact a somewhat awkward fit; most probably the original text served as a perfectly adequate eucharistic prayer without it. If so, it bears witness to a primitive strain of eucharistic understanding that was lost to other liturgical traditions.

West Syrian Churches: Syrian, Maronite, Syro-Indian

The Churches

The churches which follow the primitive West Syrian tradition are the primary heirs to the tradition of Jerusalem. Though these churches employ many anaphoral texts, the oldest and most treasured among them is that attributed to St. James, "the brother of the Lord." The three churches, Syrian, Maronite and Syro-Indian, need to be identified separately.

In the wake of the Council of Chalcedon, the West Syrian church of Antioch was divided between those who accepted the council's decrees and those who tended toward Monophysitism. The former, considered not only orthodox Catholics but also loyal subjects of the emperor, came to be called Melchites (also, Melkites; Heb. melek, king, monarch, emperor); the latter, organized by the monk Jacob Baradaï, came to be called Jacobites. In the centuries that followed, the Melchites came "more and more under the ecclesiastical domination of Constantinople, and by the end of the 13th century they had abandoned their own liturgies to the Monophysites and adopted that of imperial Byzantium" (see, The Christian Churches of the East, Vol. 1, Donald Attwater, p. 55). The Syrian church was in effect the Syro-Jacobite church. In the 17th century, some of these sought union with Rome, and since that time there have been Syrian Catholics as well as Syrian Jacobites. It is questionable just how strongly monophysite these Jacobites are; the preferred term for them is non-Chalcedonian Syrians.

The Syro-Jacobite tradition came to the Malabar region of India as a result of resistance to the Portuguese missionaries who, as noted above, tried first to Latinize the St. Thomas Christians, but succeeded only in Latinizing their East Syrian liturgy. Some who resisted sought support from the West Syrian Jacobites, and these West Syrian Orthodox Christians continue to flourish today. In 1934, some of these sought union with Rome, thus forming the Syro-Malankara Catholic church.

The history of the Maronites is transmitted more by legend than by established fact. Legend has it that a 5th century monk, Maron, founded a monastery in Syria and supported the positions taken at Chalcedon. Threat of persecution drove these "Catholic" monks to the mountains of Lebanon where, in the 7th century, under their first patriarch John Maron, the monastery of Maron became the Maronite church. Legend further has it that these Maronites were from their beginning loyal to the see of Rome and in communion with it. Available facts paint a much less precise picture, and suggest a probable Jacobite origin to this corporate entity that emerged only in the 8th century as a distinct Maronite church (Moosa).

Over the centuries, the Maronite liturgy was heavily Latinized. In a post-Vatican II revision, it has been restored to its primitive West Syrian form. The text cited to examine the West Syrian liturgical tradition as it lives today is this revised Maronite text (see, The Maronite Liturgical Year, Diocese of St. Maron, USA, 1982).

The Liturgy

(a) Introductory rites. The liturgy begins with a hymn sung during the entrance of the ministers and the preparation of the gifts. This latter is done simply at a side table. The introductory rites and service of the word are conducted at the bema. The opening doxology and prayer are followed by a general greeting of peace ("Peace be with the church and her children"), which is followed in turn by a seasonal psalm. The rites conclude with the Hoosoyo, a penitential prayer of incense, which is unique to the West Syrian tradition. It consists of a proemium or introduction, which invites the assembly to "praise, glorify and honor the Lord," the sedro, which is a rich, seasonal instruction as well as a prayer, a psalm to be sung or recited by the assembly, and the etro, or conclusion, asking the Lord to "be pleased with our service of incense."

(b) Liturgy of the Word. The service of the Word begins with the trisagion, chanted in Aramaic, and the mazmooro, a psalm chanted by the assembly and priest. One or two readings precede the gospel, which is introduced by the characteristic "Let us be attentive to the gospel of life and salvation of our Lord Jesus Christ as recorded by..." A brief seasonal response of the assembly, the koro-zooto, the homily and the creed conclude the service of the word.

(c) Pre-anaphora. The service of the Mysteries begins with the pre-anaphora, which consists of the prayer of access to the altar ("I have entered your house, O God, and I have worshipped in your temple. O King of glory forgive all my sins"), the transfer of the offerings to the altar, the prayer of offering, and an incensation of offerings, altar, cross and assembly.

(d) Anaphora. As in the East Syrian liturgy, the anaphora includes more than the eucharistic prayer itself. Strictly speaking, the term refers to the whole second part of the liturgy, right through its concluding prayer and blessing. It begins with the rite of peace, in which the "peace" is sent from the altar (which represents Christ) to the whole congregation. The eucharistic prayer follows the typical West Syrian structure: dialogue; thanksgiving narrative which includes the "Holy, Holy, Holy," and the narrative of institution; anamnesis; epiclesis; intercessions and final doxology. Even where the liturgy as a whole is celebrated in a local vernacular, it is customary, at least among the Maronites, to chant the institution words in Aramaic: not only the "words of Jesus" but the language of Jesus as well.

The bread is broken and signed with the precious blood. The Lord's prayer follows. A brief penitential rite (priest touching the consecrated offerings with one hand, extending the other over the congregation and praying for forgiveness) leads into the invitation to communion ("Holy things for the holy, with perfection, purity and sanctity"). Communion is distributed by intinction.

(e) Concluding prayers. The conclusion of the rite is simple: a prayer of thanksgiving and final blessing. The last prayer is a "farewell" to the altar: "Remain in peace, O altar of God, and I hope to return to you in peace...."

Theology and Spirit

The dominant theme running through the West Syrian liturgy is that of anticipation. The eucharist is celebrated in expectation of the Lord's second coming. While the liturgical texts are generous in singing the glory of the Lord, it is a glory that is yearned for rather than already present in its fullness. The eucharist is at one and the same time rabouno, a pledge of the glory to come, and zouodo, a viaticum which transforms us into citizens of the heavenly kingdom.

The typical prayer ending is both forward-looking and optimistic. Three examples: (a) "Then we will praise you, your only Son, and your living Holy Spirit, now and forever" (rite of peace, Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles); (b) "Make us worthy to live by your Spirit, leading a pure life, and we shall praise you, now and forever" (epiclesis, Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles); (c) "We will glorify your Father who sent you for our salvation and your Holy Spirit, now and forever" (rite of incense, First Sunday of Epiphany). This ending reveals a subtle nuance, namely, a sense of confident hope in the future that is anticipated.

The anamnesis in the eucharistic prayers is also typically a prayer that "looks forward." Even where the note of "offering" is included as well, it remains secondary to the expectation and anticipation. This prayer combines both the pledge of glory to come and the purification that transformation into God's kingdom requires. "We remember, O Lover of all, your plan of salvation, and we ask you to have compassion on your faithful. Save us, your inheritance, when you shall come again to reward justly everyone according to his or her deeds" (Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles).

The Hoosoyo, the offering of incense for purification, always begins, in some form or other, "May we be worthy to praise, confess, and glorify the Lord who..." where a seasonal reference follows the word "who." It is a prayer for purification, but it is not a self-conscious prayer that focuses on the sinfulness of those who pray. The emphasis is rather on the deeds of God recounted in narrative form and on the confidence with which we approach, even while the sense of unworthiness is strongly stated. Again, the conclusion anticipates the requested action of God which allows us (will allow us) to give God praise and glory.

As with the East Syrian liturgy, the West Syrian eucharist is strongly christocentric. Christ is addressed in prayer. After the institution narrative in the eucharistic prayers, Christ is first prayed to ("We commemorate your death, O Lord. We confess your resurrection. We await your coming") and then asked in turn to pray with the church to the Father ("Your people beseech you, and through you and with you, the Father, saying...")—the prayer returns to direct address of the Father). The greeting of peace is given to all present from the altar which represents Christ. At the prayer of forgiveness before communion the priest places one hand on the consecrated bread and wine while praying blessing on the assembly: "Bestow your blessings upon your people who love you and await your mercy" (Anaphora of St. James); "O Lord, with the strength of your powerful right hand, come now to bless your servants who bow before you" (Anaphora of St. John the Evangelist).

The liturgy moves comfortably between the awesome language of mystery and the harsh realities of everyday life. This is nicely illustrated in the peace prayer of the Anaphora of St. James: "O Lover of all people, through your redemption, free us from personal bias and hypocrisy, that we may greet each other in peace. Then, united in a unique bond of love and harmony by our Lord Jesus Christ we will glorify and praise you and your living Spirit, now and forever."

The West Syrian liturgy captures the full scope of eschatological prayer. It is optimistic, prayed in hope against the horizon of a victory already achieved. Yet it is realistic, prayed in the face of ample evidence that the victory has not yet unfolded in its fullness in human life and human history. Finally, though it is indeed forward-looking in anticipation and yearning, it is nonetheless a prayer that recognizes the importance of the present. The eschaton is even now unfolding in the lives of those who pray. The announcement of the victory at one and the same time (a) proclaims a victory achieved, (b) unveils the historical incompleteness of that achievement, and (c) purifies those who yearn for the victory proclaimed.

The Byzantine Churches The Churches

The family of churches that follow the Byzantine rite is comprised of three groups: those directly linked to the see of Constantinople, those historically evangelized from the church of Constantinople, particularly Russia and the slavic countries, and the contemporary national churches (e.g., Orthodox Church in America, with links to the church of Moscow) which likewise claim the title Orthodox. Catholic Byzantine churches (in union with Rome) include Melkites (see above), Ukrainians, Russian Catholics and Ruthenians. Apart from very slight differences, both Orthodox and Catholics follow essentially the same liturgical rites. For the eucharist three ritual forms are used: most commonly, that attributed to St. John Chrysostom; occasionally, that attributed to St. Basil of Caesarea (Cappadocia), and on some days during Lent a liturgy of the pre-sanctified attributed to Gregory the Great. The liturgical texts cited here are from The Byzantine Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom (New York: Fordham University Russian Center, 1955).

The Liturgy

The Byzantine liturgy is a complex ritual form that evolved in several stages from the 6th to the 14th centuries. Structurally it has the form of two interwoven liturgies, that which is prayed in the sanctuary (Holy of Holies) by the bishop and priest concelebrants, with the assistance of the deacon, and that conducted by deacon with assembly in front of the icon screen. A third layer of prayers consists of private prayers of the priest who prays in support of the action of the deacon and the assembly. The icon screen, and indeed the iconic display throughout the church, are integral to the liturgical act. They provide a visual focus for contemplative prayer which itself is aided by the abundant mantra-style litanies which form the heart of the deacon-assembly liturgical act. There are some churches where a deacon is not regularly employed, though this obscures the structure and flow of the liturgy itself.

The liturgy is an evolution of the West Syrian Antiochene tradition.

(a) Introductory Rites. Two elaborate rites introduce the Byzantine liturgy: the proskomidia (preparation of gifts) and a collection of litanies, hymns and prayers that are remnants of a liturgical office. The proskomidia is conducted by the priest and his assistants at a small table in the sanctuary; the three litanies are introduced and concluded by the priest and led by the deacon with the assembly or the choir providing the antiphons and hymns.

The primary focus of the proskomidia is the round loaf of leavened bread bearing the letters IC XC NI KA ("Jesus Christ conquers"). The center square is cut and placed on the paten to represent Christ. From the rest, particles are cut and arranged in rows to honor Mary, the angels, the apostles and the saints, and to commemorate the living and the dead. A particle is added for the priest himself. This whole represents the church: Christ, the Lamb, at the center gathering the church in heaven and the church on earth into one. The gifts are covered (the bread covered with the asterisk or "star of Bethlehem"), offered, and revered with incense. The sanctuary, the icon screen, the church and the assembly are honored with incense as well.

The second introductory rite begins the public prayer. It is introduced by the priest ("Blessed is the kingdom of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, now and always and for ever and ever") and consists of a long litany, with a prayer and antiphon, and two shorter litanies, also with prayer and antiphon. The hymn of the incarnation ("O only-begotten Son and Word of God...") is sung after the second antiphon.

(b) The Liturgy of the Word. The liturgy of the Word once began with the entrance of the bishop. This is now the Little Entrance, with the gospel book representing Christ carried in solemn procession ("O come, let us worship and bow down to Christ. Save us, O Son of God, risen from the dead, save us who sing to You. Alleluia"). Two seasonal hymns, the troparion and kontakion, and the trisagion precede the scripture readings. After the epistle and gospel, the prayer of intercession (the insistent litany) and prayer for, and dismissal of, the catechumens bring the liturgy of the word to a close.

(c) Pre-anaphora. The pre-anaphora begins with a prayer of access to the altar ("We thank You, O Lord, Almighty God, for having allowed us to stand here now before Your holy altar..."). This leads into the litany prayer of the faithful and the transfer of the gifts. Known as "the Great Entrance," the transfer of the gifts is made in solemn procession while the choir sings the Cherubic Hymn ("Let us who here mystically represent the Cherubim in singing the thrice-holy hymn to the life-giving Trinity, now lay aside every earthly care so that we may welcome the King of the universe who comes escorted by invisible armies of angels"). The hymn is stopped halfway through so that the commemorations of the day may be announced. The gifts are placed on the altar and incensed, the priest prays the offering while the deacon and assembly sing the litany of offering.

(d) Anaphora. The greeting of peace and the creed precede the eucharistic prayer proper. This latter, though more elaborate, follows the standard West Syrian structure: narrative of thanksgiving, including the "Holy, Holy, Holy," and narrative of institution; anamnesis ("Remembering... we offer"); epiclesis for consecration ("...and make this bread the precious Body of Your Christ, and that which is in this chalice the precious Blood of Your Christ, having changed them by the Holy Spirit"); the commemorations and the final doxology.

The preparation for communion consists of: a litany of supplication, the Lord's Prayer, a blessing of the assembly, the presentation of the eucharist to the people ("Holy things for the Holy"), and a prayer of personal faith ("I believe, Lord, and profess that You are in truth the Christ..."). Communion is distributed with a spoon or, in some churches where wafers are used, by intinction.

(e) Concluding Prayers. The liturgy concludes with a thanksgiving, dismissal and blessing. There are additional prayers as well, and frequently the eucharist is immediately followed by one of the liturgical hours or other prayers. The liturgy thus concludes slowly and in stages.

Theology and Spirit

The theology and spirit of the Byzantine liturgy is as complex as its ritual form. Indeed the two evolved together, with perhaps a greater influence on each other than in any other liturgical tradition. It does have a single, strong theme: the presence of Christ. This presence, however, has many forms and many manifestations. It is at one and the same time the presence of Christ in the liturgical action and the presence of the liturgical assembly with Christ to the heavenly liturgy which is eternally enacted. The liturgical forms reveal this presence; so too does the iconic design of the liturgical space in which the liturgy unfolds.

Some sense of the evolution of this liturgy is required to understand its complex theology and spirit. Hans-Joachim Schulz (The Byzantine Liturgy) traces its successive stages from the time of John Chrysostom (A.D. 344-407) and Theodore of Mopsuestia to its 14th-century codification.

Chrysostom spoke of the liturgy as mystery, whereby heavenly realities are made manifest in human form. Theodore focused on the individual rites as imaging different aspects of the saving work of Christ (e.g., gifts on altar representing Christ in the tomb; epiclesis as the resurrection). Special attention was given to Christ as "high priest," understood less in terms of "interceding" and more as "seated at the right hand of the Majesty in heaven."

This theological (mystagogical) reading of the liturgical actions took a turn to the spiritual in Dionysius the Areopagite (6th cent.), who "became the model for later Byzantine explicators" (Schulz, p. 25). Liturgical forms do indeed mediate salvation, but they do so by unveiling a spiritual process which unfolds in a higher sphere. It is the reverse of Theodore's stress on the actual liturgical forms making "present" Christ's saving work.

Under Maximus the Confessor (d. A.D. 662) the church structure itself became "liturgical." With the Hagia Sophia set as norm, the church building was envisioned as an image of the cosmos: two spheres, the earthly (the nave) and the heavenly (the sanctuary), not separated by, but bridged by the iconostasis. After the iconoclast controversy (8th cent.), and the vindication of reverence to icons (Nicaea II, A.D. 787), decoration of the icon screen and the church itself became part of the liturgical act. Schulz says of this middle Byzantine development: "In this decorative use of images the Byzantine church structure shows itself to be what it had to be according to Dionysius' vision of the world and what Maximus actually saw it as being: a copy of the cosmos that comprises heaven and earth, a cosmos ordered to Christ and filled with a cosmic liturgy. By reason of the images that adorn it the church itself henceforth becomes a liturgy, as it were, because it depicts the liturgico-sacramental presence of Christ, the angels, and the saints, and by depicting it shares in bringing it about. The iconography of the church also shows it to be the place in which the mysteries of the life of Christ are made present" (p. 51).

The Byzantine liturgy exhibits this dual focus. The life-of-Jesus symbolism gives shape to the proskomidia which is interpreted as the birth, infancy and hidden life of Christ. It shows itself as the gifts are placed on the altar ("The venerable Joseph took down from the cross Your immaculate Body, and wrapping it in a clean shroud with sweet spices, he carefully laid it in a new grave") and at the epiclesis ("O Lord, who sent Your most Holy Spirit upon Your Apostles at the third hour, do not, O gracious One, take him away from us, but renew us who pray to You"). The heavenly liturgy symbolism is expressed in the Great Entrance, with its Cherubic hymn, and the prayer at the Little Entrance ("O holy God, who rests among the saints, whose praises are sung by the Seraphim with the hymn of the Trisagion, who are glorified by the Cherubim and adored by all the powers of heaven..."). Both are integral to the iconic design of the liturgical space where, on the one hand, the Christos Pantokrator, set majestically in the dome, looks down over all, and, on the other hand, the biblical events of Jesus' life are set out in rich, visual display.

In several places, the Byzantine liturgy reveals itself as a public statement of Christian doctrine. The Hymn of the Incarnation ("O only-begotten Son and Word of God, though You are immortal, You condescended for our salvation to take flesh from the holy Mother of God and ever-virgin Mary") was introduced in the 6th century as a proclamation of orthodox faith against the Nestorians (see above). The wording of the epiclesis ("...having changed them by Your Holy Spirit") is a clear affirmation of the role of the Spirit as consecrator of the bread and wine, in contrast to the Western belief that it is Jesus' own words, rather than the epiclesis, that effect the consecration.

The liturgy conducted, mostly in silent prayer, by the bishop and priest concelebrants in the sanctuary is, by and large, the West Syrian liturgy as described above. This liturgy is hidden from the assembly in silence, and occasionally by a drawn veil. The priest and his actions are part of the visual, iconic display. The deacon is the primary link between these actions and the assembly, assisting the priest, announcing what is taking place, and leading the assembly in an appropriate litany prayer (e.g., during the offering: "For the precious gifts that are offered, let us pray to the Lord"; after the eucharistic prayer: "For the precious gifts that are offered and consecrated, let us pray to the Lord"). The experience of the assembly is not shaped by the intrinsic meaning of the various liturgical actions, but rather, as an aesthetico-religious contemplative experience, by the sensual environment composed of music, iconography, incense, and the various bodily movements (bows, signing oneself with the cross, kissing of icons, etc.) that are assigned to them. By entering into the assembly, they enter into a cosmos ruled by God and filled with mystery, and are transported to that realm where the heavenly liturgy is eternally unfolding.

The Armenian Church

The Church

The church of Armenia was evangelized from Edessa, and later by missionaries from Cappadocia. Its early liturgy was thus both Syrian and Greek. Its evolution as the Armenian church, with its own distinctive liturgy, is due to Gregory the Illuminator, a late 3rd/early 4th century aristocrat who was converted to Christianity in Caesarea (Cappadocia), and who returned to Armenia to convert the king (Trdat II) who had been, up to then, persecuting the Christians. As a result, Christianity became the state religion in A.D. 301, and Gregory became the leader (Catholicos) of the Armenian Church.

Gregory is not acclaimed as the "apostle of Armenia." The legends which recount the origin of Christianity in Armenia attribute this to Jude Thaddaeus and Bartholomew. The Armenians thus claim apostolic roots. Gregory's accomplishment was the conversion of the whole country and the establishment of the Armenian church.

Under Gregory, the church was more aristocratic than popular; the people had no access to the liturgy which was in Syriac and in Greek—revisions came only in the 5th century. These involved the creation of an Armenian alphabet and the translation of both scripture and the liturgy into Armenian. The Armenian liturgy is certainly Antiochene in its roots, but, apparently for political reasons, the Armenian church sided with Alexandria after the Council of Chalcedon. Hence it only recognizes the first three councils. Today there are Armenian Catholics in union with Rome, and Armenians who remain an independent church. The preferred title for these latter is the Armenian Apostolic church.

The liturgy of the Armenian church, called "The Liturgy of our Blessed Father Saint Gregory the Illuminator, revised and augmented by the Holy Patriarchs and Doctors, Sahag, Mesrob, Kud and John Mandakuni," is, as noted, rooted in the Antiochene tradition. Its evolution, however, reveals the influence of many sources: Coptic, Byzantine, and later (12th cent.) Latin. There is a sub-stratum of the Syrian liturgy of James, which may have come via the liturgy of Basil (in use in Cappadocia). It was later embellished with texts from the Chrysostom (Byzantine) and Latin liturgies. It is not therefore simply an evolution of the Syrian/Antiochene tradition. Nonetheless it remains Syrian at its deepest level. The texts cited here are from The Armenian Liturgy (tr. into English, Venice: Monastery of St. Lazarus, 1862).

The Liturgy

(a) Introductory Rites. The introductory rites consist of the vesting of the ministers in the sacristy, the entrance and absolution of the officiating priest, and the preparation of the gifts. The first two are carried out in rich ceremonial; the last is done without the elaborate ritual of the Byzantine proskomidia. When prepared and veiled, the gifts are honored with incense. Most significant in these rites is the focus on the priest.

(b) Liturgy of the Word. The liturgy of the Word originally began with the chanting of the trisagion. It was later embellished with texts from the Byzantine liturgy. It begins now with the blessing ("Blessed be the reign of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost..."), the Monogenes of the Byzantine liturgy ("O only-begotten Son and Word of God..."), which may be replaced with a seasonal hymn, a blessing, and four prayers recited by the priest while the choir sings the psalm and hymn of the day. These four prayers are the three antiphon prayers from the Byzantine introductory rites and the prayer of the Byzantine Little Entrance.

The trisagion is then sung, while the priest prays the Byzantine prayer of the trisagion. This is followed by a litany, the epistle and gospel reading, the creed (to which is appended an anti-Arian anathema), another litany and blessing, and the dismissal of the catechumens.

(c) Pre-anaphora. The pre-anaphora begins with a proclamation ("The Body of our Lord, and the Blood of our Redeemer are about to be here present..."). There follows the hagiology of the day (a seasonal catechesis), while the celebrant, if a bishop, removes the vestments of honor; or, if a priest, removes his cap. The gifts are transferred to the altar while the choir sings the Cherubic hymn and the priest prays the corresponding Byzantine prayer "humbled before the altar." The gifts are incensed, the deacon exhorts the assembly ("With faith and holiness, let us pray before the holy altar of God, filled with profound dread..."), and the priest prays the prayer of oblation.

(d) Anaphora. The anaphora proper begins with a benediction and peace greeting. The deacon kisses the altar and the arms (sic) of the priest, and then brings the greeting to the others. The eucharistic prayer, after the customary dialogue, again follows the classic West Syrian structure: thanksgiving narrative for creation and redemption, including the "Holy, holy," and leading into the institution account, anamnesis, epiclesis, intercessions and doxology. This prayer is interspersed with other prayers, blessings, greetings and gestures (incense, signing with cross, etc.), and it includes seasonal commemorations as well.

(e) Post-anaphora. The Lord's Prayer and incensing of the people begins the communion or post-anaphora. This is followed by a prayer of penitence addressed to the Holy Spirit. The gifts are presented to the people in rather elaborate fashion: a trinitarian benediction oft repeated by deacon, choir and people. The priest then invites all to communion: "Let us partake holily of the holy, holy and precious Body and Blood of our Lord and Redeemer Jesus Christ, who, descended from Heaven, is distributed among us. He is life, the hope of the resurrection, the expiation and pardon of sins. Sing to the Lord our God..." This last part is echoed by the deacon. Then, with curtain drawn, the priest prepares to take communion with a series of prayers and gestures, the longest prayer being that of John Chrysostom ("I give Thee thanks, I exalt Thee, I glorify Thee, O Lord my God, Thou hast rendered me worthy on this day to partake of Thy Divine and fearful Sacrament...").

After communion of the faithful, the priest blesses all ("Lord, save Thy people, and bless Thine inheritance..."). The bishop, if presiding, puts on his episcopal robes. There are prayers of thanksgiving, a prayer for a blessing, the prologue of John read as the "last gospel," a prayer for peace, and the final blessing. As is customary among the Byzantines, the Armenians too distribute blessed bread as the people leave.

Theology and Spirit

The tone of the Armenian liturgy is that of a "temple" liturgy, and throughout the text it stresses the notion of sacrifice more than any other Eastern liturgy.

References to the temple are clear and abundant. The hymn sung during the vesting proclaims that "holiness becomes Thy dwelling, since Thou alone art enveloped in splendor." After the confession and absolution of the priest, he prays: "Within the precincts of this temple... we adore with trembling." And again: "In the Tabernacle of holiness, and in the place of praise... we adore with trembling." During the preparation of the offerings, the priest incenses and prays: "In the Lord's temple, open to our offerings and our vows, united as we are to accomplish in obedience and in prayer the mystery of this approaching and august sacrifice, let us together march in triumph round the tribune of the holy temple..." And he is clearly a temple priest who prays: "Thou hast confided to us the Priesthood for this holy ministry and for Thine unbloody Sacrifice."

References to the sacrifice are likewise clear and abundant. A prayer during the vesting reads: "Full of fear and awe we approach Thee, to offer the Sacrifice due to Thine Omnipotence." The deacon proclaims just before the eucharistic prayer: "Christ, the Immaculate Lamb of God, offers Himself as victim." The intercessions of the same prayer are introduced by: "Grant by virtue of this Sacrifice..."; and a thanksgiving prayer chanted by the deacon mentions sacrifice no less than four times.

The way the liturgy views the priest is consistent with both temple and sacrifice.

In contrast to the Byzantine proskomidia, with its elaborate focus on the bread and wine as Christ, the Armenian introductory rites come to focus much more strongly on the priest. He confesses his sins ("I confess in the presence of God . . . all the sins I have committed") and receives absolution ("May the all-powerful God have mercy on you, and grant you the pardon of all your sins . . .") before going ahead with his service. Prayers of purification are numerous.

In addition, the texts of the liturgy put a strong accent on the majesty of God. They are more than generous in speaking of God as profound, incomprehensible, boundless, infinite, inscrutable, etc., and thus worthy of glory, power, worship, honor, praise.

Finally, note should be made of the place of the Holy Spirit in the Armenian liturgy. While it is common in both East and West to address the Spirit in the mode of invocation (epiclesis, Veni Sancte Spiritus), the Armenian text addresses the Spirit in other forms of prayer as well. To give but one example, the blessing after the Lord's prayer: "O Holy Spirit! Thou who art the source of life and of mercy, have pity on this people who, kneeling, adores Thy Divinity. . .," with its adjoining doxology: "Through Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom, as to Thee, O Holy Spirit, and to the Almighty Father, belong glory. . .."

The Alexandrian Churches: Coptic and Ethiopian The Churches

Legend has it that Christianity spread to Egypt at the hands of St. Mark, and to Ethiopia via the eunuch of Candace (Acts 8:26-40). The legends concerning Mark attribute to him the complete shaping of the church in Alexandria: he was bishop and first patriarch, ordained deacons, presbyters and other bishops, and in general was responsible for establishing the church order that was in fact a much later development (see, Atiya, A History of Eastern Christianity). With regard to Egypt it is more likely that, because of the commerce between Jerusalem and Alexandria, the path of Christianity's spread was much less precise. As for Ethiopia, it is not until the 4th century, under Frumentius and Aedesius of Tyre, that any authentic evangelization is recorded (see, Attwater, The Christian Churches of the East, Vol. 1, p. 138), with more serious evangelization coming still later at the hands of Monophysite monks from Syria.

In the 6th century, however, the Coptic church was given missionary responsibility for Ethiopia, and the church there came under the jurisdiction of the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria, a dependency that has begun to dissolve only in the 20th century. As a result of this dependency, and although the Ethiopian church had other influences as well, and indeed does have its own particular liturgical "flavor," the two can be taken to constitute a single liturgical tradition. This tradition is Alexandrian in its theological outlook, dominantly Monophysite in its Christology, and in many ways it is the polar opposite of the traditions rooted in Antioch.

The Coptic liturgy is austere, and quite evidently the product of monastic origins. Among the Ethiopians the liturgy is far more colorful, with dance, elaborate costume and a far more vibrant musical setting. Textually, however, the two liturgies are similar. The Coptic text cited here is from The Coptic Morning Service for the Lord's Day (trans. John Patrick Crichton Stuart, London: Cope and Fenwick, 1908); the Ethiopian text, which has been modified and somewhat simplified, is taken from The Ordinary and the Anaphora of the Apostles (ed. T. Baraki, Washington, DC, 1984).

The Liturgy—Coptic

The Coptic liturgy employs three

anaphoras: that of St. Basil, used on all occasions save four; that of St. Gregory, used at midnight at Christmas, Epiphany and Easter, and addressed directly to Christ; and the oldest Egyptian prayer, attributed to St. Cyril of Alexandria (d. A.D. 444) (also called the anaphora of St. Mark), used on the Friday before Palm Sunday. In the sanctuary of Coptic churches one finds three altars to allow multiple celebrations of the eucharist (Coptic custom allows only one eucharist on an altar per day). The Sunday liturgy is frequently preceded by the morning prayer of incense, parts of which are prefixed to the eucharist when the full morning prayer is omitted.

(a) Introductory Rites. The introductory rites consist of the morning office (whole or in part, as noted above), the preparation of the altar and the preparation of the offerings. The preparation of the altar consists of two prayers, both of which are prayers for the priest in his ministry. The preparation of the offerings is quite elaborate, involving the selection of the bread and wine for the eucharist, multiple blessings of the triune God, frequent processions around the altar, blessing the four corners of the earth with the hand cross, a prayer of thanksgiving, which leads into a prayer of oblation (an anaphora style prayer) addressed to Christ who is asked to "cause Thy face to shine upon this bread and upon this cup, which we have set upon this Thine holy table, bless them, sanctify them, hallow and change them, that this bread may become indeed Thine own holy Body and the mingled wine and water which is in this cup may become indeed Thine own Honourable Blood, that they may be unto us all help and healing and health for our souls, and our bodies, and our spirits."

There follows a prayer of absolution (addressed to Christ) in which Christ is asked to "bless us, purify us, absolve us, and absolve all Thy people." Incense is prepared ("The censer of gold is the Virgin; her sweet cloud is our Saviour; she hath borne him; he saved us; may he forgive our sins") and offered. The altar is revered, with multiple processions around it, the priest stopping to kiss the four corners of the altar during each, and the "first anaphora" concludes with petitions and doxology ("Through whom (Christ) are due unto Thee (Father), with himself, and the Holy Ghost, the Life-giver, who is of one substance with Thee, glory, and honor, and power, and worship, now and ever, and to the ages of all ages. Amen"). This doxology concludes the introductory rites as well.

(b) Liturgy of the Word. There is in fact no clear transition to the liturgy of the word. After the doxology, the priest incenses the altar three times, each time with an appropriate prayer (1. "We adore Thee, O Christ, and Thy good Father, and the Holy Ghost"; 2. "Before the angels will I sing praise unto Thee, and will worship toward Thine holy temple"; 3. "As for me, I will enter into Thine house, in the multitude of Thy mercies, and will worship toward Thine holy temple"). The picture of Mary is likewise incensed ("Hail to thee, Mary, the fair dove, which hath borne for us God the Word . . ."); so too are the other images. The service of readings then begins.

The Coptic liturgy employs three readings before the gospel itself: from the letters of Paul, from the catholic epistles, and from the Acts of the Apostles. Attached to each is a lengthy prayer. Between these readings and the gospel there are a series of petitions, accompanied by additional reverences to (processions around) the altar, an offering of incense on behalf of the people and the trisagion. After the gospel, which is greeted in a solemn and elaborate procession, the priest prays the gospel prayer ("...may we be made worthy to hear Thine holy gospels, and may we keep Thy precepts and commandments...").

Catechumens may have been dismissed at this point.

(c) Pre-anaphora. A prayer is prayed privately by the priest as he approaches the altar (Prayer of the Veil). The priest then introduces the intercessions which are each led by the deacon (response of the people: "Lord, have mercy") and augmented by the priest. The ministers, the people and the altar are incensed and all proclaim the Nicene Creed.

(d) Anaphora. As in the other Eastern liturgies we have seen, the greeting of peace precedes the eucharistic prayer. The eucharistic prayer of Basil is West Syrian in its structure: thanksgiving narrative, which includes the "Holy, holy" and the Supper narrative, anamnesis, epiclesis, intercessions and doxology. The institution narrative is interspersed with frequent acclamations of the people ("Amen"), as is the epiclesis ("Amen" and "I believe"). The intercessions, which include a reading of the diptychs of the dead, are quite lengthy.

(e) Post-anaphora. The prayer of fraction, which precedes the Lord's Prayer, includes acclamations of faith in the presence of Christ and acts of adoration. The Lord's prayer is followed by several prayers of remembrance and one of absolution (addressed to the Father). The gifts are presented ("The Holy to the Holy"), and after a further series of preparation prayers, including an additional proclamation of faith ("I believe, I believe, I believe and confess till the last breath that this is the life-giving Flesh which Thine only begotten Son, our Lord and God and Savior Jesus Christ took from our Lady, the Lady of us all, the holy Mother of God, the holy Mary . . ."), communion is distributed. The liturgy concludes with a prayer, blessing and dismissal.

The Liturgy—Ethiopian

The Ethiopian tradition knows of at least 22 eucharistic prayers, unique among which is one addressed in part to the Virgin Mary. The most commonly used, however, is the anaphora "of the Apostles," which is in fact an Alexandrian derivation from the prayer of Hippolytus (3rd-cent. Rome), and a variant on the Coptic anaphora of St. Cyril. The liturgical language is Ge'ez, though it is usually celebrated in the contemporary vernacular, Amharic.

Noticeably absent from the Ethiopian liturgy, when compared with the Coptic, are the frequent processions around the altar with reverence (kissing) given to the altar's four corners.

(a) Introductory Rites. After the opening sign of the cross (remnant of the Coptic office of incense), the priest announces: "How wondrous this day and how marvelous this hour in which the Holy Spirit will come down from the high heaven and overshadow this offering and sanctify it." This same text is employed in the West Syrian liturgy as a diaconal announcement prior to the epiclesis.

Attention is then turned to the offerings, with the same lengthy ritual form we saw in the Coptic liturgy. The bread is blessed ("Christ, our true God, sign with your right hand + and bless this bread, + hallow it with Your power and strengthen it with your Spirit"). The offering is made (again, a West Syrian text), the chalice is blessed, and then the bread and wine both are given the trinitarian blessing. A doxology introduces a prayer of thanksgiving and another of absolution, and the first anaphora (addressed to Christ) is begun. Reminiscent of Theodore of Mopsuestia, whose theology is evident in both the East Syrian and West Syrian traditions, the prayer of the veil, as the celebrant covers the bread and wine, recalls: "What we have placed upon this blessed paten is in the likeness of the sepulchre in which you stayed three days and three nights. . . ." Long prayers of general intercession conclude the introductory rites.

(b) Liturgy of the Word. The liturgy of the word begins with an invitation to stand, a greeting of peace, and invitation to adore "the Father, the Son and Holy Spirit, three persons, one God," and the prayer to Mary, recited by all ("You are the golden censer, that bore the glowing charcoal..."). The traditional four readings are reduced to two though the "reading prayers" have been retained. Between the epistle and the gospel praises of Mary and the trisagion are prayed and the blessing of the four "cardinal points" is given.

(c) Pre-anaphora. The rites before the eucharistic prayer include: a prayer of blessing and intercession, the creed, a prayer of purification (washing of hands), a doxology ("Glory to God in the heavens, and peace on earth to men of good will"), and kiss of peace.

(d) Anaphora. The anaphora of the apostles is essentially the Hippolytus text, with the "Holy, Holy, Holy," and other acclamations of the people included. There are, as in the original, no intercessions within the eucharistic prayer proper.

(e) Post-anaphora. A complex fraction rite follows the eucharistic prayer, and, together with a prayer of thanksgiving, introduces the Lord's prayer. This is followed by a series of prayers (of blessing, for forgiveness, of remembrance—including the commemoration of the dead). When the gifts are presented to the people ("Holy things to the holy"), a prayer over penitents and a profession of faith in the eucharist is made ("I believe, I believe, I believe and profess..."). Final prayers of preparation for communion follow.

After communion there are prayers of thanksgiving, an imposition of hands in blessing of the people, a final blessing and dismissal.

Theology and Spirit

The Alexandrian theological tradition stands in contrast to the Antiochene on several counts. Its emphasis on the majesty and otherness of God is stronger, its ability to deal with the fullness of the incarnation weaker. In trinitarian theology it tends towards subordinationism, of Son to Father, of Spirit to both. In Christology it tends to emphasize the divine over the human. In liturgical theology it tends to stress the spiritual meaning of the symbols and the eternal realm in which that meaning resides. The sanctuary screen in the Coptic churches separates heaven from earth rather than uniting the two and bridging the gap.

Probably the most notable piece in both the Coptic and Ethiopian liturgies is the attention given to the bread and wine in the introductory rites and the seemingly consecratory "first anaphora" to Christ. There is a parallel in the Coptic baptismal liturgy which may illuminate this prayer. Before the baptism, ordinary water is solemnly "consecrated" for the baptism; afterwards, with a prayer equally as solemn, it is "returned to ordinary use." It is as though materials of the earth, in this case the bread and wine, require a preliminary "consecration" to render them fit for the subsequent consecratory action of God.

Equally of note, at least in the Coptic version of this liturgical tradition, is the attention paid to the altar. The altar is the altar of sacrifice which the priest approaches unworthily. Many of the processions around the altar, including kissing the altar's four corners, accompany prayers of intercession offered in worship to God. The altar is likewise a symbol of the one who is offered ("We adore Thee, O Christ, and Thy good Father, and the Holy Ghost. Behold, Thou hast come, Thou has saved us"—said while incensing the altar). Placing the gifts upon the altar places them as well on the altar above ("Receive them upon Thine holy reasonable Altar in heaven for a sweet savour of incense"—said while incensing the gifts placed upon the altar).

Finally, the place of Mary is unique. She is called the "censer of gold" whose "sweet cloud is our saviour" (Coptic) and the "golden censer that bore the glowing charcoal whom the blessed One . . . accepted from the Sanctuary" (Ethiopian). She is also the one who makes strong supplication for us before God.

Conclusion

The liturgical traditions of the East contain a vast richness of Christian faith and prayer, a richness that only can be hinted at in these brief descriptions and reflections. Their perceptions of God range from the distant Other to the One "made flesh" who "dwelt among us." Their perceptions of the people who worship range from those free to participate in the heavenly mysteries to those unworthy to approach, from those who rejoice in the victory of Christ to those who must wait for the day of its fullness, from those who stand tall before the majesty of God to those who bow low in humble and awe-filled adoration. Together they reveal the many faces of the Mystery, of God creator, of Christ redeemer, of Spirit sanctifier. Together they reveal the many ways in which God approaches us and summons us to approach God in return.

See Eucharist, history of, in the East; Reform, liturgical, in Eastern churches; Sacraments in Eastern churches

A.S. Atiya, A History of Eastern Christianity (London: Methuen and Co., 1968). I. Dalmats, Eastern Liturgies, trans. D. Attwater (New York: Hawthorn, 1960). A. Schmemmann, Historical Road of Eastern Orthodoxy, trans. L. Kesich (Crestwood: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1977; orig. 1963). A. Butler, The Ancient Coptic Churches of Egypt, 2 vols. (Oxford: Clarendon, 1884, rev. 1970). J. Meyendorff, The Byzantine Legacy in the Orthodox Church (Crestwood: St. Vladimir's Press, 1982). H.-J. Schulz, The Byzantine Liturgy, trans. M. O'Connell (New York: Pueblo, 1986; orig. Die byzantische Liturgie, Trier: Paulinus-Verlag, 1980).

D. Attwater, The Christian Churches of the East, Vol. I: "Churches in Communion with Rome"; Vol. II: "Churches not in Communion with Rome" (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1961 [Vol. I], 1962 [Vol. II]). T. Nersoyan, trans., The Divine Liturgy of the Armenian Apostolic Orthodox Church (London: St. Sarkis, 1984). S. Mercier, The Ethiopic Liturgy: its sources, development and present form (Milwaukee: Young Churchmen, 1915). Diocese of St. Maron, U.S., The Maronite Liturgical Year, 3 vols. (1982). M. Moosa, The Maronites in History (Syracuse: University Press, 1986). G. Every, Understanding Eastern Christianity (London: S.C.M., 1980).

PETER E. FINK, S.J.

TRADITIONS, LITURGICAL, IN THE WEST: POST-REFORMATION

Since 1500, Western Christianity has been blessed with the development of no fewer than ten different liturgical traditions. But before we describe each of these in turn, we need to begin with some basic definitions. By the "West" we mean the Christianity of western Europe and the areas colonized by it including the Americas, Australia, New Zealand, and segments of Africa and Asia. "Traditions" are inherited liturgical practices and the understanding of those practices which can be transmitted relatively intact from generation to generation. We shall define our period as roughly the last five centuries, beginning with the start of the Reformation in 1517.

The process of developing new Christian liturgical traditions is a natural process of inculturation as worship patterns are adjusted to reflect, and sometimes create, changes in peoples. Even within traditions there normally are cultural and ethnic styles: black Lutheran congregations, for example, where gospel song seems more natural than chorales but where the liturgical tradition is definitely Lutheran. Thus it is easier to define the center of a liturgical tradition than it is to be precise about its edges since most can accommodate a wide variety of styles. In addition, no tradition is static. All change from generation to generation so that they must always be seen as in transition even when service books are frozen. The prayerbook of the Church of England did not change for more than three hundred years but everything else in its worship did. We are not examining unchanging essences but living objects.

All ten traditions ultimately derive from the worship life of late medieval western Europe. This was loosely centralized in Rome but consisted in considerable variety according to diocesan uses and religious communities. Our method will be to treat the ten traditions emanating from this background in order of conservatism, i.e., the degree to which they continued to reflect the late medieval synthesis. Some elements persisted longer among Protestants than Catholics, some Catholic changes were more radical than some changes among Protestants, so we must deal with a mixed bag. But the total degree of conservatism can give us an organizing principle. Everyone thought in the 16th century that they were restoring the worship life of the early church even more than we fancy we are doing so today. The political metaphor of conservative, moderate, and radical in degree of change will serve us well. Thus we have three basically conservative traditions: Roman Catholic, Lutheran, and Anglican; two moderate ones: Reformed and Methodist; and five radical groups: Puritan, Anabaptist, Frontier, Pentecostal, and Quaker. In each instance, we move from right to left.

Roman Catholic

The Council of Trent (1545-1563) sought to bring about a conservative reform by radical means. The Fathers of Trent were concerned to end avarice, corruptions, and superstitions in worship but their minds were directed to defending the status quo whenever possible, partly because the lack of liturgical scholarship allowed them to believe, for example, that St. Peter had composed the Roman canon and that to change existing practices was to abolish that which was apostolic. Furthermore, changes would be seen as conceding that the Protestant Reformers were right after all.

The method of reform chosen was that of liturgical standardization, a possibility with the advent of the printed book. The revision of the liturgical books was entrusted to the curia and proceeded with the breviary (1568), the missal (1570), the martyrology (1584), pontifical (1596), bishops' ceremonies (1600), and the ritual (1614). The means of enforcing global uniformity was entrusted to the new Congregation of Rites, established in 1588. So began almost four centuries of liturgical uniformity, reaching even to China (and thus devastating evangelization of that country). The "era of rubricism" that ensued found theological safety in rigid liturgical uniformity.

At the same time, much of worship did change because books and bureaucrats could control only so much. A brilliant period of Baroque architecture spread around the world, inspired by the work of Gian Lorenzo Bernini (1598-1680) and the example of the Jesuit church in Rome, Il Gesu. Jungmann speaks of the Baroque spirit and the traditional liturgy as "two vastly different worlds." New devotions came to the forefront, especially benediction and exposition of the Blessed Sacrament; the cult of the saints came to focus largely on the Virgin Mary. Devotions to the Sacred Heart of Jesus and visits to the Blessed Sacrament became popular. In France, the new standardized books were resisted for three centuries, coming into consistent use only in the late 19th century after experimentation with much local variety and vernacular uses.

The Enlightenment of the 18th century failed to make much of a mark despite the efforts of the Synod of Pistoia (1786) to make reforms that were two centuries too early. The 19th century saw the beginnings of the first liturgical movement, led by Prosper Guéranger (1805-1875) and a series of monastic leaders notably Lambert Beauduin (1873-1960), Virgil Michel (1890-1938), and Odo Casel (1886-1948). This lasted until after World War II and was acknowledged in the conservative encyclical Mediator Dei (1947). A later liturgical movement began after the war, deriving its agenda largely from Protestant worship (vernacular, cultural pluralism, active participation, preaching at Mass, popular hymnody) and centered largely in countries with Protestant majorities.

More recently, Vatican II in its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963) moved Roman Catholicism to embrace these newer reforms. The result has been revision of the Tridentine liturgical books in less than twenty-five years and translation of them all. The introduction of the vernacular has been accompanied by much more flexibility and a variety of options in the rites. While these reforms have been widely welcomed by the laity, Rome seems presently concerned with preventing adaptation or inculturation from going too far. Even so, the distance traveled since Trent has been enormous.

Lutheran

There are a number of reasons for considering the Lutheran tradition as the most conservative of the Protestant traditions of worship. Martin Luther (1483-1546) had a high respect for the existing Christian cultus; his inclination was to purge those aspects that could not be reconciled to his theology and to retain the rest. He could be quite radical on occasion (as with the canon of the Mass) but on the whole retained more than he rejected. He tended to move carefully; others anticipated him on vernacular liturgies.

After statements in The Babylonian Captivity (1520) that were to be determinative for almost all subsequent Protestant sacramental theology, Luther moved to liturgical reform with vernacular baptismal rites in 1523 and 1526. The same years also saw new eucharistic rites, the Formula Missae (in Latin) and Deutsche Messe (in German). Later years saw forms for marriage, ordination, and penance. In general, existing practices endured but rites were in the vernacular and popular participation was promoted whenever possible.

Three emphases stand out: music, preaching, and frequent communion in both kinds. Luther considered music one of God's greatest gifts and cultivated its use in worship through service music and hymnody. He led the way in writing hymns himself and vigorous hymn singing has always been a hallmark of this tradition. Luther's insistence that preaching be a part of all congregational worship contributed to a rebirth of preaching. He also encouraged all the laity who were properly prepared to receive the bread and wine at each eucharist.

As for vestments, images, and much of the medieval cultus that was theologically neutral, Luther allowed their continuance; they came to be known as "adiaphora" or things indifferent. Thus much more survived in Lutheran countries, especially in Sweden and Finland where Lutheran worship remained its most conservative, than in other Protestant countries. Yet even this is relative. Recent studies have shown just how much survived during the long period of Lutheran Orthodoxy. In Bach's Leipzig there were daily public prayers, a weekly eucharist with a great many communicants, and a rich observance of the church year. Although the services were in German, one gets the feeling that not all that much had changed from the Middle Ages in two hundred years of Lutheranism.

The real change came not with the Reformation but with the Enlightenment.

Daily services in Leipzig ended in the 1790s and much of the continuing medieval cultus vanished in the face of rationalism, even in the church of Sweden. Much of this has been blamed on the influence of the Reformed tradition but more is probably due to the Weltgeist. The 19th century, saw a gradual reaction to the Enlightenment with an attempt to recover early Lutheran worship. In Germany, Wilhelm Loehe (1810-1895), in Denmark, Nikolai Grundtvig (1783-1872) and various other leaders elsewhere sought a return to Lutheran orthodoxy and orthopraxis. The indication of their success is successive revisions of various service books and hymns. More recent versions, especially the American Lutheran Book of Worship (1978), have moved into the ecumenical mainstream while retaining a Lutheran character, especially in the emphasis on music.

Anglican

The Anglican tradition is ambiguous: what started off as a fairly moderate reformation and remained so for three centuries reversed itself in the 19th century and moved to reappropriate a great deal of the medieval cultus. To modern observers, Anglican worship seems more conservative than Lutheran but the theological origins are far more liberal. Anglican liturgy began with Archbishop Thomas Cranmer's (1489-1556) two editions of the Book of Common Prayer, that of 1549 and the much more radical 1552 book. Using the latest technology, Cranmer sought to put all the services in the hands of everyone by translating, condensing, and revising them before publishing them in popular versions under a price ceiling.

Cranmer succeeded in recovering daily services of public prayer, which became a staple of Anglican worship. Many of the ceremonies associated with the sacraments and other rites disappeared from the 1552 edition and the theology became much more unambiguously Zwinglian. Martin Bucer (1491-1551) provided much of the structure for the ordination rite but Cranmer was not prepared to accept as high a view of the eucharist as Bucer and Calvin. A great ornament of the book was Cranmer's linguistic ability to cast traditional Latin prayers in the language of his contemporaries.

After the brief regression of the Marian years, Anglican worship tended to stabilize during the long reign of Elizabeth I. As a political settlement, episcopal forms of church government were retained as well as something of the appearances of public worship, although there had been much iconoclasm even before the rise of Puritanism. Weekly communion proved to be too radical a step for most people and canon law eventually settled for a minimum of three celebrations a year. The normal Sunday service came to be morning prayer, litany, ante-communion, and sermon. Popular hymnody was lacking but magnificent choral daily services characterized worship in the cathedrals. The poet-priest George Herbert (1593-1633) offered an example of Anglican parish ministry at its best.

The Puritan takeover of the Church of England from 1644 to 1660 moved things leftward in a radical direction but only temporarily. The restoration period afterwards attempted to return to the status quo of 1604, as the prayer book of 1662 showed. Despite the survival of a high church tradition (without much ceremonial) most Anglicans were comfortable in a tradition that avoided the excesses of either Catholicism or Puritanism. In the 18th century, this meant worship that was edifying and moralistic but with little concern for the sacraments or anything overtly supernatural.

In the 19th century, reactions came in the form of a recovery of patristic theology (the Oxford Movement, Tractarianism, Puseyism) and to a full scale recovery of late medieval ceremonial (the Cambridge Movement, Ritualism). These brought back weekly celebrations of the eucharist at just the same time this was occurring among Disciples of Christ, Mormons, Plymouth Brethren, and the Catholic Apostolic church. A new emphasis was placed on baptism, penance, and the revival of medieval architecture, liturgical arts, and choral music. Congregational hymnody also made its advent.

The 20th century has seen an indigenous liturgical movement in the Church of England, manifesting itself as the parish communion movement in the 1930s. Recent years have seen wholesale revision of Anglican prayerbooks around the world, usually either following the patterns of Cranmer or trading in such late medieval forms for the 3rd century model of Hippolytus.

The Reformed

We now move further left to the central or moderate traditions: Reformed and Methodist. The Reformed Tradition has several roots: Zurich, Basel, Strassburg, and Geneva. In some ways, it preserved more than its share of the penitential strain of late medieval piety. In other respects, however, it moved beyond the forms which Lutheranism and Anglicanism were content to continue. In time it was largely seduced by the Puritan tradition (in Great Britain) and the Frontier Tradition (in America).

Ulrich Zwingli (1484-1531) began his reformation of Zurich heavily influenced by humanistic studies and a thorough biblicism. He was anxious to return worship to its biblical roots and eager to make it more spiritual, reflecting the gap he saw between the physical and the spiritual. Although a fine musician, he rejected music in worship as distracting one from spiritual worship. Iconoclasm in Zurich purified or devastated the churches, according to one's viewpoint.

Zwingli retained the four Sundays or festivals when his people were accustomed to receive communion or the eucharist, a preaching service being held on the other Sundays. These four occasions saw a drastically simplified rite which focused on transubstantiation of the people, not the elements.

Martin Bucer in Strassburg and John Oecolampadius (1482-1531) in Basel began experimenting with vernacular services. At Strassburg this included daily prayer services and a Sunday service derived from the Mass. Bucer's influence was spread further by a visiting preacher out of a job, John Calvin (1509-1564). While serving temporarily a French-speaking congregation in Strassburg, Calvin adapted the German rite Bucer was using. Calvin brought this rite to Geneva and from 1542 on it became the model for much of the Reformed tradition. Although deriving its structure from the Mass via Bucer, it had moved to highlight the penitential aspects of worship and was highly didactic and moralistic. Relief from this somber mood was wrought by encouraging the congregation to sing metrical paraphrases of the psalms which they did with fervor. Such devotion to psalmody (and the exclusion of hymnody) marked Reformed worship for several centuries and still does in some churches.

Calvin's low esteem for human nature was balanced by a high view of God's word and the sacraments. (Although almost all Protestants considered baptism and the eucharist as sacraments, Luther was willing to include penance, Calvin possibly ordination, and Zinzendorf marriage.) Calvin's doctrine of eucharistic feeding on Christ through the operation of the Holy Spirit, although certainly not without problems, was the most sophisticated Reformation eucharistic doctrine but largely lost by his heirs.

John Knox (ca. 1505-1572) transmitted this tradition to Scotland as others

brought it to France, the Netherlands, and the Germanic countries. Knox's liturgy, renamed the Book of Common Order, flourished in Scotland for eighty years after 1564. Only then did the Scots yield to the Puritan effort to achieve national unity in worship through the Westminster Directory of 1645. This moved away from set forms to more permissive patterns yet the Directory remained vaguely normative in later editions in America. On the American frontier, the newly emerging frontier patterns of worship tended to engulf the Reformed tradition.

A pattern of recovery, similar to the one we have seen already slowly eventuated in America. Charles W Baird (1828-1887) led the way in 1855 with a title many thought oxymoronic, Presbyterian Liturgies. German Reformed Christians experienced a recovery of both theology and liturgy in the so-called Mercersburg Movement. Eventually an American service book, the Book of Common Worship, followed in 1906 as did service books in the Kirk of Scotland. In recent years, Presbyterians have followed closely in the same post-Vatican II ecumenical mainstream as other traditions of the right and center, signified by publication of their Supplemental Liturgical Resources.

Methodism

We move to a later period, the 18th century, to observe the origins of Methodism. Basically it can be seen as a countercultural movement in the midst of the Enlightenment. When the sacraments were on the margin of church life, early Methodism put them at the center; when religious zeal was in disrepute, Methodism made enthusiasm essential; where religion was confined to the churches, Methodism took it to the fields and streets. John Wesley (1703-1791), the founder of Methodism, was a faithful son of the Church of England and never ceased in his love for its worship. The Methodists under Wesley functioned virtually as a religious order under a General Rule within the established church.

Distinctive features of early Methodist worship were "constant communion," i.e., frequent eucharist, fervent preaching for salvation, vigorous hymn singing (then a novelty), care of souls in small groups, and a mixture of extempore and fixed prayers. Charles Wesley (1707-1788) wrote hymns by the thousands; he and John created a great treasury of 166 eucharistic hymns. John Wesley practiced pragmatic traditionalism, preferring ancient forms for modern needs when possible: vigils became the Methodist watchnight, the agape surfaced as the love feast, and the covenant service was adapted from Presbyterianism. In 1784, John Wesley published his service book for America, the Sunday Service, advocating, among other things, a weekly eucharist.

Much of this did not survive the transit of the Atlantic, and American Methodism soon discarded Wesley's service book but not his hymn book. Much of the sacramental life was dissipated although the texts for the rites remained largely intact. Instead, Methodism tended to adapt many of the techniques of the frontier. Camp meetings abounded for a time and eventually resulted in a distinctive revival type service. Fanny Crosby (1820-1915) wrote many hymns of personal devotion to the blessed Saviour while Charles A. Tindley (1856-1933) was a prolific black hymn writer.

Despite the prevalence of revival style worship, there persisted in America a number of areas where more formal worship was preferred, such as in Birmingham and Nashville. Thomas O. Summers (1812-1882) was the leader of a 19th-century liturgical movement in the south which effected the reprinting of Wesley's service book and produced a standard order of worship. Wesley's prayer book long remained in use in England, or even the Book of Common Prayer. In general, Methodists in the 19th century reacted against the new ritualism of the established church in England, only to adopt some aspects of it several generations later.

Revivalism gave way to a period of aestheticism with much discussion of "enriching worship." This, in turn, gave way to a neo-orthodox period of recovering historic liturgies, especially Wesley's. Recent decades have seen more attention to assimilating the post-Vatican II Roman Catholic reforms, especially the lectionary. The new (1989) United Methodist Hymnal shows how far this has gone and may mark the beginning of a neo-Protestant emphasis on keeping the identity of one's own tradition.

Puritans

We move beyond the central traditions in our steady progression to the left to look at the five remaining traditions. It is not always easy to say which is the most radical but we shall place Puritanism closer to the center than the Anabaptists because the Puritans insisted on national reformation through a state church and the Anabaptists did not. The exception to this rule is small groups of Separatists who believe in reformation without tarrying for anyone and went ahead and did in private what the Puritans did openly when they controlled the national church. Since some Separatists picked up antipedobaptist ideas in the Netherlands, there are also close links between them and the Anabaptists.

Puritanism began in the ranks of Anglican exiles fleeing the persecutions of Queen Mary, although Edwardian Bishop John Hooper (?-1555) was a proto-Puritan. Puritans could favor various forms of church government—Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Congregational—as in accord with God's word, but they had one common theme in worship: it must be according to God's word. Even the blessed John Calvin had been so blinded by the brightness of the new light that he had not gone far enough. Calvin had been content with general prescriptions for worship drawn from scripture; the Puritans wanted specifics. If it was wicked to disobey God's ethical injunctions, liturgical disobedience was no less reprehensible. Papistical ceremonies which survived in Anglican worship such as the sign of the cross in baptism, the wedding ring, confirmation, and holy days were all of human invention and therefore unscriptural. In this sense, no issue was minor for all were clear questions of obedience.

The Puritans' opportunity came when they controlled Parliament in the 1640s and 1650s and were able to enact a series of reforms. The Book of Common Prayer was abrogated from 1645 to 1660 and the Westminster Directory substituted. In Scotland, a Directory for Family-Worship was instituted in 1647 and became the basis for a long continuing practice of daily prayers in families. But it was in America that the Puritans first were able to institute a state church reformed according to God's word. In Salem (1629) and Boston (1630) the Reformation was finally completed according to their lights. Holy communion was celebrated monthly, worship was heavily dominated by preaching, but the congregation could respond and question the minister's exegesis and application, and psalmody provided another form of participation.

In the 18th century much of this was superseded by the emotional fervor of the Great Awakening which brought a variety of other churches to New England villages. In England and America, a considerable segment, usually those preferring a more dignified style of worship, moved into Unitarianism. Unlike other traditions, little effort was spent in recovering past patterns. Much of the Puritan tradition passed into liberal Congregationalism or Unitarianism without much concern for recovering a 17th century golden era.

In recent years much of the same post-Vatican II time of assimilation has occurred, especially in accepting the lectionary, church year, and other common themes. The newest United Church of Christ service book, Book of Worship (1986), is the most liberal denominational service book, especially in inclusive language, and is probably not widely used except for special services.

Anabaptists

We must return to the 16th century to pick up our last tradition originating in that period of liturgical ferment. It is not easy to generalize about the Anabaptist elements of the Radical Reformation known largely today as Mennonites, Amish, and Hutterites but we can trace some common features. Surprisingly, the more radical traditions tend also to be most conservative when it comes to stabilizing and continuing the same worship forms across the centuries.

The earliest Anabaptists, the Swiss Brethren, began in contact with Zwingli in Zurich. But they took his biblicism a step further than he was willing to and argued vehemently against the baptism of any but believers. Their basic premise came to be the need for a pure church of believers who led holy lives. This was impossible to reconcile with the magisterial reformation which relied upon state support. Both Protestants and Catholics vied with each other to persecute Anabaptists or "rebaptizers" as they became known because of their refusal to accept their own baptisms as infants. Immersion was not an issue and most of these groups baptized by pouring or sprinkling.

A variety of leaders arose with small groups of followers. The typical congregation met in a secluded spot under a leader called and ordained by the congregation. Because persecution was so constant, martyrdom was frequent and a rich hymnody of martyrdom developed, some of it still in use. For the church to be kept pure, not only must the entrance be narrow in the form of baptism for believers only, but members not living a holy life were expelled by the ban and shunned in accordance with biblical precept (1 Cor 5:13).

Despite their radical origins, several Anabaptist groups have kept faithful with genuine conservatism. The Old Order (Amish) worship in private homes much as their ancestors did, the Hutterite communities even retain the use of 16th century sermons, and even the larger Mennonite groups resisted most 19th century American influences by remaining relatively isolated communities. Although their numbers remain relatively small, the disciplined lifestyle of these people make them much admired.

The American Frontier

We leap forward now to the very beginnings of the 19th century in America. A new social situation developed in America after the Revolution with the development of widely scattered pioneers on the frontier. No traditional parish system was adequate and large numbers of the population were as unchurched as they were illiterate. A means of reaching them soon developed, strangely enough out of the sacramental seasons which Presbyterians of Scotch-Irish origins observed several times a year. These periods of intense preparation before celebration of the eucharist developed soon into the camp meeting in which thousands of people assembled from miles around for a period usually of four days of preaching, singing, spiritual direction, baptism of converts, all culminating in the Lord's Supper. More than any other individual, Charles G. Finney (1792-1875) brought the frontier techniques or "new measures" back to the east coast despite stubborn resistance from his fellow Presbyterian ministers. Domesticated into east coast gentility, these included protracted meetings lasting over several days, the mourner's bench, prayer for individuals by name, and frequently midweek prayer meetings at which even women were allowed to speak.

The great attraction of this new frontier tradition was that it worked. It had completely substituted pragmatism for traditionalism (unlike Wesley) and Finney had a great scorn for previous forms of worship. Frontier style worship worked in the sense that it made converts, snatching them from darkness into the blinding light of conversion and could rekindle that fire again and again. The normal patterns of worship came to be tripartite: prayer and praise, preaching for salvation, and harvest of converts. Music played a great part in the first portion, often caricatured as "preliminaries." So attractive did this style of worship become that like a black hole it pulled many a Lutheran, Reformed, Methodist, Puritan, and even Quaker congregation into it.

As such it is the dominant worship tradition in the United States. Great denominations such as the Southern Baptist, Disciples of Christ, and Churches of Christ feel at home within this tradition although the latter two insisted on a weekly eucharist led by lay people. In recent years, this tradition has felt little temptation to borrow from the recent Roman Catholic reforms, although the lectionary has made some inroads. As worship for the unchurched, this tradition is a natural for modern television evangelism. Millions participate in this kind of worship via television each Sunday. By its standards it still works and works very well, so why change? Hence radical as it was, it has conserved many of its forms, only adapting them to new media.

Pentecostal

The advent of the 20th century brought an even more radical tradition, the Pentecostal. Whereas all the traditions we have examined thus far proceeded on the basis of structured worship, usually led if not dominated by a single leader, the Pentecostals turned the doors wide open to the Spirit which might blow anywhere or use anyone in the congregation. Here was a tradition in which blacks and women played major roles from the very beginning.

The beginnings were inauspicious, a broken down faith healer, Charles Parham (1873-1929), playing John the Baptist to a one-eyed black holiness preacher, William J. Seymour (1870-1922). From Topeka to Houston, the fire smoldered and suddenly in 1905 burst into flame at the Azusa Street Mission in Los Angeles. Crowds attended from America and the fire spread to Portland, to Chicago, to Norway, and to England, soon touched Chile and Brazil, and eventually reached out to Africa.

Pentecostal worship centered in the unexpected possibilities of the Holy Spirit reaching out by showering gifts on individuals for the benefit of all. Speaking in tongues came to be the best known gift, revealing an individual's baptism of the Spirit. But it was by no means the only gift: healing, interpretation, and prophecy blossomed where least expected. It was true liturgical democracy. Women leaders were prominent and often more colorful than the men. Every black neighborhood has a Pentecostal chapel or two, yet in recent years highly affluent communities have also seen the advent of this worship tradition.

Beginning in 1960, Pentecostal or charismatic worship made its advent among Roman Catholics. After initial resistance, it has been welcomed in Roman Catholic and Protestant communities alike. Meanwhile, classical Pentecostalism has reached millions of people in Latin America and become one of the largest forces shaping Christianity in Africa. Sober historians have predicted that the majority of Christians one day will be in the southern hemisphere and that most of them will be Pentecostals.

Quakers

It is easy to identify the Quakers or Society of Friends as the most radical tradition of all in its break from late medieval forms of worship. All the groups we have mentioned thus far have clergy, the preaching of sermons, and outward and visible sacraments. The classical forms of Quaker worship have none of the above although we may detect some indirect links with medieval mysticism. Paradoxically, most Quakers have tempered their radicalism by being the most conservative in fidelity to their original forms. Roman Catholic worship has changed far more than has Quaker worship in England or the east coast of America.

The origins of Quaker worship lie in the soul-searching of George Fox (1624-1691) and his discovery of the inner light in every human. This brought one closer to God than scripture or sacraments for it was direct access to the Spirit itself with no need for the mediation of clergy or set forms. Furthermore, such direct access was available to all, male or female, slave or free. It was as radical as Paul's concept of baptism. Thus any study of liturgy and justice must begin with the Quakers, for what they practiced in worship was what they felt compelled to practice in all of life. What F.D. Maurice (1805-1872) and Percy Dearmer (1867-1936) or Virgil Michel (1890-1938) and H.A. Reinhold (1897-1968) later advocated had been common practice among Quakers for several centuries. Since all were equal before the Spirit, women had as much right to speak in worship as men and anyone who could see the Spirit in a black person had no right to keep him or her in slavery. Since no one was marginalized in worship, it also meant no one should be honored by clothing or titles in society. Decisions were to be made by the "sense of the meeting" since a vote always means defeat for a minority. Whatever else it is, the Spirit seems to be fair and consistent.

But though it could dispense with sermons and sacraments, the one thing Quaker worship could not surrender was the Christian community itself, the "meeting." Hence as all Christians have discovered, the most important act in worship is coming together in Christ's name. Quaker worship is a form of corporate mysticism in which the Spirit uses individuals to speak to the group. Greatly to be feared is putting oneself forward by rushing into words. Only after a time of centering down can one feel ready to speak under the compulsion of the Spirit. It was felt that Christ had not intended outward baptism and communion to continue any more than footwashing. So these sacraments occur in inward and visible ways only.

Quaker worship involves a great sense of personal restraint and even great Quaker saints such as John Woolman (1720-1772) worried after first-day meeting (Sunday) that they might have spoken from the self rather than the Spirit. A high degree of biblical literacy is also presupposed. The Spirit, after all, is the author of scripture too and will not contradict itself whether in the Bible or in reason.

On the American frontier, as had so many other traditions, some Quakers adopted frontier forms of worship, especially in Indiana. Thus evolved services with structured worship, paid clergy, and even outward sacraments. Sometimes unstructured or unprogrammed worship could be integrated into services which were basically structured. But many east coast and English Quakers worship still in ways that would not astonish George Fox, so stable has Quaker worship been.

This has been a quick journey through five centuries of worship in the West. Worship forms have continued to develop as people have changed. The Puritans were the pious yuppies of their times and they demanded worship forms that reflected who they were. The evolution of new traditions is as natural as the change in peoples. Modern attempts to conflate liturgical traditions, to obtain any form of consensus in the ways a variety of Christian peoples worship their God, are highly dubious efforts. Just as social change sneaks up on us when we least expect it, so new liturgical traditions will evolve in the West where unexpected. They may be feminist, or incorporate insights of eastern cultures, or reflect the effects of new technologies on people (as did book publishing), but they most likely will occur in ways no one yet can anticipate. They may be already in our midst.

Horton Davies, Worship and Theology in England (Oxford and Princeton: Oxford University Press and Princeton University Press, 1961-1975). Hughes Oliphant Old, Puritan Roots of Reformed Worship (Zurich: Theologischer Verlag, 1975). Bard Thompson, Liturgies of the Western Church (Cleveland: Meridian, 1961). James F. White, Protestant Worship: Traditions in Transition (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1989).

JAMES F. WHITE

TRADITIONS, LITURGICAL, IN THE WEST: PRE-REFORMATION

In origin, evolution, and spirit, the liturgical tradition of the Western church is complex and diverse. What is known as the Roman rite was only one of several Western rites which existed between the 4th and 16th centuries; the others are known as the North African, Ambrosian, Spanish, Gallican, and Celtic rites.

Liturgical Diversity and Roman Influence

In matters of worship, local churches were free to develop their own forms, and often did so in conjunction with the churches of the same region under the authority of the metropolitan bishop who served as primate of the region or "diocese" as it was termed in the Roman Empire. The bishop of Rome, as primate of the part of Italy extending south of the city of Rome (i.e., Italia suburbicaria), had the right to insist that churches in that region conform to Roman usages (See letter of Innocent I to Decentius of Gubbio; 19 March 416). In like manner, the bishop of Milan as primate of Italia annonaria, the bishop of Carthage as primate of Africa, the bishop of Carthago Nova (until 531) or of Toledo (after 531) as primate of Hispania, the bishop of Arles as primate of Septimania, and the bishop of Lyons as primate of Gaul, could convoke synods and insist upon adherence to liturgical canons.

Until 1080, the Roman see never attempted to control the liturgical observances of churches outside of Italia suburbicaria. Indeed, because of the Lombard invasions, its sphere of liturgical influence was limited to the narrow corridor which joined Rome and Ravenna. As a matter of fact, the bishop of Rome was well aware of the need for diversity of forms to suit the temperament of different peoples. In 597, when Augustine of Canterbury wrote to ask Gregory I why the churches of Gaul and of Rome had different usages and which rite to use for the newly converted Angles, the pope replied: "... you should carefully select for the English church whatever is most able to please almighty God, whether it come from the Roman, Gallican or whatever church you may find it.

... Things ought not be loved because of the place from which they come, but because they are good in themselves. Therefore choose elements that are reverent (pia), awe-inspiring (religiosa), and orthodox (recta) from each and every church and arrange them as in a little book in accord with the mind of the English and so establish them as custom"

(Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae 2, 334).

Emergence of the Traditions

Although most of what we know about the individual rites can be discerned only from the evidence of extant liturgical texts and artifacts, the various Latin rites emerged when improvisation was still predominant, and long before the date of the oldest surviving manuscripts. The practice of improvisation, however, presupposed the faithful observance of certain canons, guidelines or principles which were transmitted in the local church from one generation to the next. At the core of this liturgical patrimony was the structure of the service, the framework for improvisation. In all the traditions, the first composition of written texts was nothing more than a new type of improvisation. A set of texts was prepared for a specific celebration and afterwards placed in the local archives as a record of the celebration. Fifth-century Rome witnessed the production of a great number of variable texts for the eucharist, the composition or editing of euchological texts for the administration of the sacraments and for use at the liturgy of the hours. By the end of the same century, samples of this written improvisation had found their way to northern Italy, southeastern Gaul, and northeastern Spain, inspiring a veritable explosion of euchological creativity throughout the West, giving additional impetus to the emergence of the local rites, and leading eventually to the compilation of the numerous liturgical books of each tradition (6th-9th centuries).

1. Liturgy of North Africa

It is certain that North Africa, the cradle of Latin Christianity, was likewise the first place to use Latin in the liturgy. Without discouraging the ancient practice of improvisation, councils and synods (e.g., Hippo [393] can. 25) provided guidelines for formulating liturgical prayers and insisted that prayers composed elsewhere be approved by the teachers (fratres instructiores). The composition of prayers by heretics prompted a later synod to direct that "preces, prefationes, commendationes and impositiones manuum" be composed under supervision of the hierarchy and used by all (Carthage [407], can. 10).

African collections of libelli missarum and even sacramentaries are referred to in writings from the 5th century; but, apart from a few Arian fragments, no actual liturgical texts have survived. Nevertheless, details of the rite have been gleaned from non-liturgical sources, e.g., conciliar decrees like those already mentioned and especially the writings and sermons of Augustine of Hippo. The following order of the Mass is based on a reconstruction by F. Van Der Meer (Augustine the Bishop, [Sheed & Ward, 1961], pp. 388-402).

(In this and all subsequent outlines, the asterisk marks a chant by the people or choir; the readings are marked in SMALL CAPITALS.)

Entrance of the Clergy
Greeting

EPISTLE

*PSALM (Aug. considered this a reading)

GOSPEL

Homily

[announcements]

Dismissal of the Catechumens

Solemn Intercessions

Offering with *Psalm singing

Preface dialogue

Improvised Preface without Sanctus

Approved Eucharistic prayer

"Amen"

Fractio

Lord's Prayer

Communion with *Psalm 33

Final prayer

Dismissal

The year after Augustine's death (430) the African church saw the beginning of more than a century of bitter persecution by the Arian Vandals. In 698, Carthage was taken by the Moors and the church that had given birth to Latin Christianity ceased to exist altogether.

2. The Gallican Liturgy

Properly speaking, the Gallican rite refers exclusively to the liturgical tradition which emerged in the southern part of Gaul at the beginning of the 6th century and remained in use throughout the province until it was replaced (fused) with the Roman rite under the Carolingians (late 8th-9th centuries).

The study of the Gallican rite is hampered by the sparsity of its liturgical books and some major elements of the liturgy remain completely deprived of any documentation. There are euchological texts for the celebration of the eucharist and for the administration of the sacraments (Missale Gothicum, Missale Bobbiense, Missale Francorum, and several Mass-fragments; benedictionals=collections of episcopal blessings given before communion; diptychs=tables of names for the commemoration of the living and dead; and ordines scrutiniorum=formulas for the celebration of the scrutinies) and the system of readings has left fragmentary evidence in lectionaries, capitularia=lists of first and last words of the pericopes and passionaria=lives of the saints read both at Mass and the office on their feasts. No Gallican antiphony for the Mass or hours has been preserved though the hymns of the Gallican hours and a few genuine Gallican chants may have survived in the Gregorian chant tradition (Huglo, 114-122). To complicate matters further, most of the sources already mentioned include Roman material; for example, the Bobbio missal preserves the structure of the Gallican Mass only as far as the preface where it abandons the variable Gallican prayer for the Roman canon.

In contrast with the Spanish, Milanese, and Roman rites, the Gallican sources indicate an enormous diversity, even between neighboring dioceses; for example, the church at Auxerre—as evidenced in the collection of Masses published by Mone in 1850—used very different formularies but followed basically the same order of service as the church of Autun where the Missale Gothicum was compiled. At the time other rites were being codified and standardized to some extent, the churches of Gaul and Septimania suffered the successive invasions and ensuing political divisions of the Visigoths, Ostrogoths and Franks—all in the first half of the 6th century. Codification was far from systematic or uniform in spite of the attempts of local councils to regulate church life and worship.

The following outline of the Gallican order of the Mass has been re-constructed from letters of Pseudo-Germanus of Paris (ed. Ratcliff, 1971) and the sacramentaries mentioned above:

- [Preparation of Offerings at side altar or in sacristy]
- *Antiphona ad praelegendum with Psalm
- Call for silence and Greeting
- *Trisagion and *Kyrie
- Prophetia (= Benedictus; or a hymn in Lent)
- Collectio post Prophetiam
- LECTIO PROPHETICA
- *Responsorium (?)
- LECTIO EX APOSTOLO
- *Canticle from Daniel (= Benedictiones on feasts; or (?))
- *Trisagion ante evangelium
- EVANGELIUM
- *Sanctus post evangelium
- Homilia
- Preces
- Collectio post precem
- Dismissal of catchumens
- Solemn presentation of the Gifts with Sonus*
- Praefatio missa* and collectio
- Names and collectio post nomina
- Collectio ad pacem* and Pax
- Contestatio (Immolatio missae)* and Sanctus*
- Vere sanctus*-institution narrative-post mysterium
- Confractionem*
- Lord's prayer

Episcopal Benediction
 Communion and Treca*num
Post Eucharisticam and Collectio post com- munionem
 Dismissal

A distinguishing characteristic of the Gallican rite lies in its use of variable texts in the eucharistic prayer before and after the institution narrative (post sanctus and post mysterium). In this it contrasted with the fixed canon in the Roman and Milanese rites but also to some degree with the Spanish rite which also used variable pieces in the eucharistic prayer. The Gallican provides no system but simply a repertoire of texts for the three pieces—contestatio (preface), post sanctus, post mysterium—without coordination or connection among them. This is all the more noteworthy given the fact that there was an attempt to match “proper” orations for the other parts of the Mass to the feast or season.

With regard to the euchology for other ritual and sacramental celebrations, the typically Gallican approach included an introductory invitation directed to the faithful (bidding) which anticipated and sometimes contained the blessing which followed. In the case of ordinations, the unit included three elements: the instruction of the candidates, the invitation to prayer and the blessing/ordination prayer. This form was an expansion of the ancient and universal liturgical prayer unit (which is best known in the Solemn Intercessions on Good Friday in the Roman rite): invitation to prayer—silent prayer—concluding oration. The practice is so characteristic of the Gallican rite that a number of the variable texts for each Mass originally assumed this form of instructive invitation to prayer (Praefatio missae, Post Eucharisticam). The combination of instruction, invitation, and prayer in the compilation of texts for other ritual and sacramental celebrations was amply employed by the liturgical compilers of the Carolingian period and served as one of several ways in which the ancient Roman liturgy was “Gallicanized” (Vogel, 150-155).

Given the heterogeneity of the Gallican repertoire, it is almost impossible to make an evaluation of style and content which is universally applicable. However, those texts which actually originate with the Gallican rite betray a conservative tendency in using the traditional vocabulary, phrasing, and syntax that are found in the oldest Gallican sources. Although the same phenomenon has been noted in a few Ambrosian and Spanish prayers, it is a veritable characteristic of Gallican euchology. An important indication of the adherence to the tradition appears in the Gallican equivalent to the anàmnēsis in the post mysterium: only the death of the Lord is recalled as in the Pauline gloss of 1 Cor 11: 26 and as seems to have been the case in North Africa at the time of Cyprian. In this, the Gallican rite stands alone; even the Spanish include at least the death and the resurrection in the post pridie.

It has often been suggested that the Gallican style is one of exuberance and prolixity, elaborate ceremonial and splendor. Such an evaluation is not justified and neither does it take into account the varied origin of the Gallican repertoire of prayers and practices. In reality, at least among the texts which are genuinely Gallican, one finds extreme conciseness and density of content, reflecting the prose style of the time and region. The fact that so much was so readily borrowed and adapted from Eastern and Spanish sources—another Gallican characteristic in itself—contributes to the impression that Gallican means long-winded.

On the other hand the later Gallican compilers did add extra prayers to the rites. The so-called apologiae and “accompanying prayers” first make their appearance in Gallican sources, though it is difficult to say whether or not they were inspired by the Irish. The apologies were private prayers in which the priest acknowledged his sinfulness and unworthiness; the others include private prayers for vesting, for the offertory and for before and after communion. Many of these made their way into the Gallicanized-Roman books of the 8th and 9th centuries but the famous Missa Illyrica (=sacramentary of Sigebert of Minden [10th century]) includes nearly 200 of them newly composed or compiled from several sources.

3. The Spanish Liturgy

The Spanish liturgy, also known rather inaccurately as "Mozarabic" or "Visigothic," is the autonomous liturgy which was in constant use in Spain from the beginning of the 6th century until it was suppressed by the Council of Braga (1080) at the insistence of Pope Gregory VII (1073-1085). At the time of its codification, when Visigothic rule reached its greatest extension (7th cent.), the Spanish rite was celebrated throughout the Iberian peninsula and in the region of southwestern France known as Gallia Narbonense. After its suppression, it continued to be celebrated in a few parish churches for a time, and with intermittent periods of complete abandonment, in a single chapel at the cathedral of Toledo into the 20th century.

Among the surviving manuscripts of the Spanish liturgy there are diutici (=variable texts for the eucharist) that may have been copied from 3rd century sources and constitute the major evidence of a native liturgical patrimony. In the diutici contained in the missale mixtum of Cisneros (16th century), there is resonance with both the letters of Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258) and the Acta of the martyrdom of S. Fructuoso of Tarragona (d. 258) who, like Cyprian, suffered under the persecution of Valerian.

Although inspired by the Roman libelli of variable texts, neither the Spanish nor the Gallican authors renounced the order of the Mass they had received as part of their ancient liturgical patrimony. The Spanish left the prayer of the faithful and the kiss of peace where they had been after the liturgy of the word and composed a series of variable texts for them (ad orationem; ad pacem) in addition to the variable inlatio, post sanctus and post pridie which formed their eucharistic prayer. Thus, in contrast to the Roman system which spread variable texts throughout the Mass but maintained a fixed canon, the Spanish concentrated their variable texts at the center of the celebration.

In spite of the relative independence of individual pieces, the Spanish used brief formulas, (remnants of the old improvisational structure?) to make a transition from one piece to the next. With this system it was possible to achieve innumerable variations on the same theme, and at the same time give a sense of unity and cohesion to the whole eucharistical complex. The aim for unity and cohesion with great variety is a distinguishing trait of the Spanish authors and one that was maintained throughout the evolution of the rite.

This characteristic is apparent as well in the richness, harmony and refinement of the chants and orations of the office books and in the Liber Ordinum (=ritual/pontifical for other sacramental celebrations). The coordination of the Mass and hours with the other sacramental celebrations is also worthy of note; for example there was not only a votive Mass for marriage, for the sick, for the dead, but a votive office in each case as well. The ritual/pastoral care extended beyond the actual exchange of rings, anointing, or burial to include the entire liturgical life of the community and the role of the individual in that life. The introduction to the Lord's Prayer in the votive Mass for the sick illustrates the strong ecclesial sense in the Spanish rite; it ends: "so that when the sickness of body and soul has been driven out, these who are ill may pray with us, saying 'Our Father...'" (Férotin, Liber Ordinum, col. 377).

Several historical factors contributed to the systematic codification of the Spanish rite. From the time of its invasion by the Arian Visigoths in 414 until the invasion of the Moors in 711, the Iberian peninsula was politically united. With the conversion to Catholicism of the entire kingdom in 589, the political unity was reinforced by religious unity. The resulting climate favored the collection, codification, and eventual standardization of liturgical texts and practices.

In addition, because their greatest liturgical creativity postdated that of the other Western rites, the Spanish could incorporate the "teaching" of liturgical texts from other rites, the canons of the christological councils, and the liturgical theology in the patristic sermons of such as Augustine and Leo. As in Milan, the liturgy in Spain was considered the most efficient means for planting the truths of the faith in the minds and hearts of the Christian people and was purposely formulated with orthodox precision. In part this explains why the Spanish authors of this era applied themselves to the composition of liturgical texts instead of the production of ascetical or dogmatic treatises, exegetical commentaries on the scriptures, or long homiletic sermons.

A clear example of their high esteem for the liturgy is the De ecclesiasticis officiis of Isidore of Seville (d. 636), the first treatise on the liturgy which not only describes the local rite, but contains much useful information about Milanese and African uses as well. Complementing Isidore's treatise are the invaluable liturgical canons of the synods and councils, especially the "national" Councils of Toledo IV-X (633-656). Knowing their own rite to be in a state of flux, the council fathers enumerated and illustrated the ancient liturgical uses which they felt should be maintained by all but simultaneously provided a forum for exchanging the innovations of the liturgical creativity which flourished in the various provinces. As a result, the Spanish rite represented euchological schools from several provinces: Tarragona—S. Eugenius (d. 657); Seville—Ss. Leander (d. ca. 600) and Isidore (d. 636); Braga—Profuturus (fl. ca. 538) and S. Martin (d. 580); Toledo—Ss. Eugenio II (d. 657), Ildefonso (d. 667), and Juliano (d. 690). The saintly bishops of Toledo were responsible for the definitive form of the liturgical books that survived the subsequent onslaughts of the Moslem invasion, Carolingian expansion, and theological controversies that would reach a climax in the Gregorian suppression of 1080.

With regard to the office, the Spanish and Gallican churches maintained a strict distinction between "cathedral" and "monastic" hours. Iberian councils directed that monastic and ecclesiastical customs should not be mixed (Braga 563, can. 1); and that monks were not permitted to use the public churches for anything but cathedral services: matins, vespers and Mass (II Toledo 675, can. 3). One of the earliest books produced in the Spanish rite is the Liber psalmographus, an office book filled with several series of psalm prayers which constitute a veritable commentary on the psalms, most of which have been given a christological and ecclesiological interpretation.

The Spanish order of the Mass is outlined as follows:

* Prelegendum with psalm

Trisagion

Greeting

LESSON (PROPHETIC)

* Psallendum / Psallmo (Trenos in Lent)

[* Clamor on certain days]

EPISTLE

GOSPEL

* Laudes

Dismissal of catechumens

* Sacrificium with verses for offertory procession

Missa (= bidding)

Alia oratio
Nomina Offerentium
 Diptychs
Post Nomina
Ad Pacem
 Pax
 Preface Dialogue ("Aures ad dominum"
 ... "Sursum corda" ... Deo ac Domino nostro, Patri, et Filio, et Spiritui Sancto, dignas laudes et gratias referamus...)
Inlatio and *Sanctus
Post Sanctus
Missa Secreta (= Institution Narrative)
Post Pridie

 *Laudes ad Confractionem
 [Creed on Sundays and Feasts]
Ad orationem Dominicam
 Lord's Prayer and variable embolism
Commixtio and Trisagion
Benedictio (Three-fold Blessing of the people)

 Invitation to communion
 *Ad Accedentes (variable, often beginning with Ps. 33, 34)
 Communion of all with both species

Completoria = post-communion prayer (after 10th century)
 Dismissal

4. The Ambrosian Liturgy

Though usually associated with the metropolitan see once occupied by Saint Ambrose (d. 397), the Ambrosian rite includes in addition to the liturgy celebrated in the city of Milan (i.e., the Milanese liturgy), the liturgy of several other dioceses of Northern Italy (Bergamo, Ticino, Novara, Vercelli, etc.), and to a certain extent, the liturgy of Aquileia

Unlike the other non-Roman Western rites, the Ambrosian liturgy was never officially suppressed by emperor or pope. In spite of Carolingian and later attempts to "Romanize" everywhere, the Ambrosian liturgy survived with numerous medieval accretions (Roman and non-Roman), but underwent major restorations first under Carlo Borromeo (d. 1584) and then at the beginning of the 20th century under Cardinals A. Ratti (later Pius XI) and I. Schuster. It was completely revised and translated into Italian in the 1970s.

The liturgical patrimony of the Ambrosian liturgy was largely the result of strong Roman and Eastern influences. After its emergence as a distinct rite it came to share many of its features with all the Western rites, often serving as the bridge between East and West. What distinguishes it from all the other liturgical traditions, however, can be understood only in the context of the theological and political anti-Arianism in which it arose and evolved. With the exception of the Roman liturgy, the Arian controversy had a major effect on the euchology of all the Western traditions, though in no case did this struggle perdure as at Milan. In fact in its emergence (4th-5th centuries), its development (6th-7th centuries) and in the period of its stabilization (8th-9th centuries) the Ambrosian liturgy had to fight constantly against this heresy in one form or another. The most obvious result is the strong christocentrism of the Ambrosian prayers, in both original texts and in the editing of texts borrowed from Roman and Carolingian sources.

The centrality of Christ is manifest not only in the careful consideration of the incarnation and the virginal birth but also in the veneration of the Virgin Mary. In Ambrosian iconography it is possible to trace a progression from the Kyrios-Pantocrator to Deus-Homo, Homo-Deus, and Nobiscum-Deus, which corresponds to the various stages in the development of Ambrosian euchology. It is here that the Ambrosian influence on the other Western liturgies was most strongly felt.

In the early Middle Ages, the Ambrosian eucharist had the following order:

*Ingressa no psalm
 *Kyrie
Oratio super populum = collect

PROPHETIC LESSON

*Psalmellus

EPISTLE

*Alleluia with verse (Cantus during Lent)

GOSPEL

Homily

Dismissal of Catechumens
 Kyrie and Antiphona post Evangelium
 Pax

Oratio super sindonem
 Offertory procession; Offerenda* with verses

Proper Preface and Sanctus
 Invariable Canon
 Fraction and Commixtio; Confractorium*

Lord's Prayer and embolism
 Communion; Transitorium* no psalm
Oratio post communionem
 *Kyrie and Dismissal

The Ambrosian office was unique in the West in spreading the psalter over two weeks. Like the Roman and Benedictine cursus, however, the Ambrosian assigned psalms 109/110-147 to vespers. As in the cathedral office of 4th-century Jerusalem and the "Chaldean" rite, the morning office at Milan consisted of three canticles, the Laudate psalms (148-150), gospel reading and a procession to the cross or baptistery, while vespers began with the lucernarium.

The Ambrosian chant tradition is preserved in some 300 north Italian manuscripts, most from the late 12th century and later. Though sharing many features and texts with Gregorian chant, the Ambrosian has a closer affinity to the Old Roman and Beneventan traditions.

5. The Celtic Liturgy

The term "Celtic rite" has been used for the ancient liturgy celebrated in Ireland, Scotland, Britain, Galicia and Brittany before these churches gradually adopted the calendar and liturgy of Rome (as early as 633 in Galicia and as late as the 11th century in Scotland). In a more restricted sense, the "Celtic rite" refers to the liturgy celebrated in the churches and monasteries of Ireland and regions heavily influenced by Irish missionary-monks from the late 6th to early 9th century.

With regard to the Mass, the liturgy represented by the few books and fragments that are of Irish provenance do not possess a sufficient cohesion nor do they reflect a work sufficiently autonomous and original to constitute a separate rite. While all rites borrowed elements from other traditions, the Irish seem to have done very little in the way of composing original prayers or codifying texts and arranging ceremonies. Some evidence indicates the adoption of an expanded Roman ordinary with few variable texts (exemplified in the Stowe Missal) while other sources follow a Gallican or Spanish order (as in the sacramentary fragments of Fulda and St. Gall). When the work of an Irish hand does appear, it betrays a remarkable familiarity with obscure patristic writings and liturgical formularies from all over the Christian world — Egypt, Rome, Gaul, but especially Spain and Milan — genuine "souvenirs" of the missionary activity of Irish monks.

In outline, the structure of the Mass in the Stowe missal follows:

Confession of sins and litany of saints
 (Roman and Irish)
 [preparation of gifts at the altar] several collects *Gloria collects
 EPISTLE and collect
 *Psalm and collect diaconal litany collects post preceam
 GOSPEL
 *Alloir=Alleluia
 oratio super evangelium

partial uncovering of the gifts Creed
 full uncovering of gifts collect [names or litany]
 oratio post nomina
 additional collects [pax]

Preface Dialogue
 Celtic preface and *Sanctus
 Roman canon (with names for both mementos) or post sanctus leading to qui pridie
 Elevation of Chalice and Host

Fraction with *Antiphon and collect
 Lord's Prayer with embolism
 Pax
 Commixtio

Communion; *Processional hymn
Collects
Dismissal

According to the "tract" which follows the Masses in the Stowe missal, the Mass was sung in its entirety. Although no written melodies survive from the Celtic chants, the Irish are known to have taught them to the monks of Northumbria (northern England) who abandoned them when John the Archcantor from St. Peter's was "borrowed" to teach the Roman chants (ca. 675).

Dependence on continental sources is also discernible in the Celtic celebration of the hours, though similarities to other Western rites are not as pronounced as in the Mass. What survived of the early cathedral office in Irish monastic rules relates closely to the cathedral tradition in the rest of the West; lauds in the Antiphony of Bangor (late 7th century) is almost identical to the office at Milan. The purely monastic hours, on the other hand, show remarkable creativity. None of the Gallican monastic rules followed Cassian's description of Egyptian monastic practice as closely as the Irish who arranged the psalms for the horae diurnae (secunda (sic)=prime, terce, sext, none, vespers), assigning three thematically appropriate psalms to each. For the night office, the Irish monastic rules are unique: Columban assigned 12 psalms to the first two night hours (initium noctis = Gallican duodecima?, medium noctis) but during the third hour (matutinum or vigilia) his monks prayed anywhere from 24 (summer weeknights) to 75 psalms (Saturdays and Sundays from Nov 1 - Jan 31). The division of the night office into three hours is itself unique to the Irish.

Unlike the liturgists of the Mediterranean rites, the Irish authors had neither an ancient liturgical patrimony nor a tradition of Christian-Latin literature of their own as a basis for formulating Celtic euchology. The fact that they used a language that was not their own may explain, at least in part, the extent of their eclecticism. But the Irish monks were avid scholars, collectors and copyists of everything they could obtain—Greek and Latin. Their particular choice of elements from so many liturgical traditions betrays, if anything, a fascination with the unusual and the obscure.

The Irish proved themselves most original in illumination of manuscripts and the composition of hymns and collects for the office. They used the idioms, language, ideas, and forms that had grown out of the various traditions of the Church and transformed them into artistic and poetic forms that clearly reflect their native genius. The Eastern influence can be discerned in their illuminations which are nevertheless filled with Gaelic serpents and dragons. Though in Latin, many of the hymns and collects in the Antiphony of Bangor are composed in meter that do not reflect either classical or accentual rhythmic patterns but instead follow the ancient meters of their native poetry, replete with rhyme and alliteration.

The devotional practices and original texts of the Celtic authors reflect a lifestyle that is centered more on a personal than on an ecclesial relationship with Christ and the ever-present Trinity. The most obvious and influential example is the practice of private penitence which followed the missionary monks on all their journeys. This typically Irish individualism was absorbed into the "renaissance" of the Carolingian era and reflected in its reshaping of the Western liturgy. The piety which produced long lists of apologiae (prayers of unworthiness) and influenced the Romano-Frankish or Romano-Germanic liturgy for the rest of the Middle Ages was manifest quite early in the liturgical texts of Ireland.

6. The Roman Liturgy

As mentioned at the beginning, the Roman rite was originally confined to the city of Rome and its suburbicarian dioceses. But even within the city itself there were differences in ceremonies, prayers, chants and melodies for the Mass and office.

(a) Ordo romanus I describes a stationary Mass when the pope presides. The stationary liturgy was celebrated only on certain days and was intended as the main liturgical celebration of the day or hour. As such, it was attended by "everyone" in the city or at least by the clergy.

(b) Ordo romanus II prescribes a different order if one of the seven "suburban" (as opposed to nearly 100 "suburbicarian") bishops, or one of the Roman presbyters as the pope's representative presides at the stationary liturgy.

(c) A simpler order was used by the presbyters when they presided in the tituli on stationary days (no basilica was large enough for the whole city) or on ordinary Sundays when there were no stationary celebrations.

(d) The presbyters—and later the monks—who had the task of supplying the daily liturgical needs of pilgrims at the cemeterial shrines combined elements of both the stationary and titular celebrations.

The differences in celebration were first recorded in different collections of libelli missarum and ordines that were later shaped into the so-called Gregorian (=stationary) and Gelasian (=presbyteral or titular) sacramentaries and in ordines romani (=collections of rubrics for nearly every kind of celebration). In the meantime records were being kept of the cycle of feasts, the readings, and the chants of the stationary celebrations that would eventually be compiled into lectionaries and antiphonaries. Once the major basilicas were staffed with their own full-time clergy and monastic communities (5th-10th centuries) records were kept of particular customs, chants, and reading lists for Mass and office that differed considerably from one side of the city to the other.

The order of the Mass in all these different circumstances was eventually, if not always, identical to that described in Ordo romanus I:

Entrance of ministers; Introit* with psalm
*Kyrie
[Gloria; at first at presbyteral masses on Easter only] Collecta

APOSTULUS
Gradual* (Alleluia in Easter)
Alleluia* (Tractus in Lent)
EVANGELIUM

Offertory procession; Offertorium* with psalm Super oblata (Secreta)

Preface Dialogue
Praefatio and Sanctus*
Canon missae

Lord's Prayer and embolism
Pax
[Announcements/Dismissals]
Fractio; Agnus Dei*
Communion with both kinds; Communio* with psalm
Ad completa (post communionem)
Dismissal

This was the Roman liturgy that impressed the Germans and Franks long before the Carolingian era. Beginning in the 7th century, bishops or monks returning from pilgrimage or diplomatic mission to Rome were anxious to adopt Roman customs—especially those of St. Peter's or the Lateran—in their churches and monasteries. They were the first to bring copies of libelli, sacramentaries, ordines, lectionaries, antiphonals, even relics of the Roman martyrs and choir directors to teach the cantilena romana so they could truly replicate the "rite of the Apostolic See."

The decision by Pepin (d. 768) and Charlemagne (d. 814) to replace the chaos of the Gallican rite with what they perceived to be a fully organized and standardized liturgy from Rome simply continued the process of Romanization. It was only partially successful, however, for two reasons: (a) the reform extended only as far as real authority was able to enforce it; and (b) the papal (=stational) texts sent from Rome were incomplete and had to be supplemented with additional material drawn from the local, previously Romanized sources (i.e., the Gallicanized Gelasians of the 8th century; see Vogel, 64-105; 144-155). Even where a Roman text was complete the Frankish copyists tended to insert Gallican elements they simply refused to do without (e.g., the paschal candle and its Exsultet). The next two centuries saw the continued creation of a hybrid, Romano-Frankish or Romano-Germanic liturgy that, under the influence of the German emperors (962-1073), became the Roman rite in the city itself.

The hybridization of the rite did not mean the deletion of Roman material; it meant the addition of new material. Both the hours and the Mass became so overburdened with accretions (such as the votive offices of the dead, of all saints, and of the Blessed Virgin and the numerous apologiae already mentioned) that the public worship of the church became an unbearable burden. "Medieval monastic life suffered from sheer exhaustion, from overnutrition and consequent spiritual indigestion" (S.J.P. Van Dijk and J.H. Walker, Origins of the Modern Roman Liturgy, [Westminster, MD: Newman, 1960] pp. 16-17). In order to get its work done, the papal court had to prune back the overgrowth and practically abandon the ancient stational system of the city, producing shorter offices and less elaborate ceremonial for celebrations in cappella (in the papal chapel).

There is an undeniable difference in the theology of the eucharist, holy orders, and church between late antiquity when the Roman rite developed as an expression of the church of Rome gathered around its bishop and the Middle Ages with its piling up of Masses and its ordaining of priests to "offer the sacrifice for" a multitude of intentions. The liturgical forms and formulae, however, though suffocated by accretions, were maintained throughout the Middle Ages "as a treasured inheritance of the liturgy, guarded as the "tradition of the Apostles from the City of the Apostles" (Vogel, p. 158).

With so many accretions to choose from, ancient local traditions to preserve, the lack of efficient means for standardization, liturgical uniformity could hardly be attempted if even conceived. For the remainder of the Middle Ages and beyond, there were enough divergences in calendars, texts, chants, and ceremonial from one diocese to the next or from one religious congregation to the next to constitute separate "rites" though technically there were countless variants or "uses" of the Roman rite; to list a few: the "Uses" of Sarum, York, Hereford, Aberdeen; the "liturgies" of Nidaros, Lyons, Rouen, Braga, Benevento, Hungary, and Jerusalem (sic); and the "rites" of the Cluniacs, Carthusians, Cistercians, Praemonstratensians, Dominicans and Franciscans. This last usage (Franciscan) is nearly identical to the abbreviated form used regularly in the papal chapel. Carrying this "papal" Mass and office on their journeys across the Alps, the friars couldn't have realized history was repeating itself. The liturgy in this form was the direct ancestor of the Breviarium Romanum (1568) and the Missale Romanum (1570) "restored by the sacred council of Trent; published by order of the supreme pontiff Pius V," and, for the first time made binding — with some reservations — on the whole Western church.

Cyrille Vogel, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources, trans. and rev. by W. G. Storey and N.K. Rasmussen, O.P. (Washington, D.C.: Pastoral Press, 1986). Richard W. Pfaltz, Medieval Latin Liturgy: A Select Bibliography (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1982). Salvatore Marsili, ed., Anamnesis 2: la Liturgia panorama storico generale (Casale Monferrato: Casa Editrice Marietti, 1978). Klaus Gamber, Codices liturgici Latini antiquiores, Spicilegium Friburgensis subsidia 1, 2 vols. (Freiburg: Universitätsverlag, 1968). Maurice Férotin, Le Liber Ordinum en usage dans l'église wisigothique et mozarabe d'Espagne du cinquième au onzième siècle, Monumenta Ecclesiae Liturgica, 5 (Paris: Librairie de Firmin-Didot, 1904). Maurice Férotin, Le Liber Mozarabicus Sacramentorum et les manuscrits mozarabes, Monumenta Ecclesiae Liturgica, 6 (Paris: Librairie de Firmin-Didot, 1912). Michael Curran, M.S.C., The Antiphony of Bangor (Blackrock, Ireland: Irish Academic Press, 1984). Robert Taft, S.J., The Liturgy of the Hours in East and West: The Origins of the Divine Office and Its Meaning for Today (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1986). Joseph A. Jungmann, S.J., The Mass of the Roman Rite: Its Origin and Development, trans. by F.A. Brunner, C.Ss.R., 2 vols. (Westminster, MD: Christian Classics, 1986). Juan Francisco Rivera, Estudios sobre la Liturgia Mozarabe (Toledo: Diputación Provincial, 1965). Michel Huglo, Les Livres de chant liturgique (Brepols: Turnhout, 1988).

JOHN K. BROOKS-LEONARD

TRINITY AND LITURGY

The doctrine of the Trinity is the specifically Christian doctrine of God. It expresses what it means to believe in the God who saves through Jesus Christ, by the power of the Holy Spirit. The purpose of trinitarian doctrine is not so much a speculative theory about the nature of God, but the explication of the meaning of God's presence in the economy of salvation as it stands in relationship to what God is from all eternity (the being of God).

The economy of salvation is God's plan for creation (oikonomia = plan or administration), brought about through Christ and the Spirit. Jesus Christ is the revelation of God, the visible icon of the invisible God. The Holy Spirit restores the image of God in us by conforming us to the person of Christ, thereby making each person a partaker in the divine nature ("deification" or theosis). According to the doctrine of the Trinity, the mystery of grace and redemption and the mystery of the triune God are to be thought of as two dimensions of one reality. Put another way, the mystery of Christ and the Spirit and the mystery of God are one and the same mystery of love: God gives to us God's very self. Further, the goal of the economy of salvation, as well as the fulfillment of the human person, is nothing other than the eschatological glorification of God (cf. Eph 1:12; 2 Cor 3:18; John 17).

The primary purpose of the trinitarian confession of faith is doxology (praise of God). The doctrine of the Trinity is therefore a prime instance in which worship and doctrine are inherently bound up with each other. Since theology and liturgy are related to each other as types of doxology, we should be able to determine something about what we believe on the basis of how we pray (lex supplicandi legem statuat credendi; the law of prayer founds the law of belief). Consequently, the doctrine of the Trinity should function as the central doctrinal explication of what we practice daily in public prayer: the praise and glorification of God (Father) through Christ in the power of the Holy Spirit. Just as liturgy should function as a source and context for trinitarian theology, so liturgical theology and theological reflection on the liturgy should proceed within the context of the specifically Christian doctrine of God, namely, the doctrine of the Trinity.

Even if trinitarian doctrine and theology have not always played a vital role in shaping Christian thought patterns and religious consciousness, the format of Christian prayer and worship is a continual reminder that Christian faith is indeed trinitarian faith. Christian liturgy has sometimes been called "the cult of the Trinity" (la culte de la Trinité), not for dogmatic reasons but because its symbols, structures, and rhythms disclose the basic pattern of Christian faith: everything comes from God (Father), through Christ, in the Spirit, and everything returns to God (Father), through Christ, in the Spirit (Eph 1:3-14).

The trinitarian dimension of Christian faith is reflected both in individual sacraments and in other liturgical practices (e.g., liturgy of the hours). In one sense, every aspect of Christian liturgy is trinitarian—not because of the number “three” nor even because God is always named Father, Son and Spirit—but because the purpose of liturgy is to glorify the God of the oikonomia, the very God who is revealed through Christ and the Spirit. The trinitarian character of Christian liturgy is to be sought and located in the fact that liturgy, by definition, is the ritual celebration of the events of the economy of redemption and as such is the celebration of the mystery of God.

Four aspects of Christian liturgy deserve particular mention here: the structure of the liturgical year; the sacraments of initiation; doxologies; creeds.

Liturgical Year. The liturgical year constitutes the basic framework for the church’s public prayer. Each year the Christian community re-lives the principal events of the one divine economy centered around Christ and the Spirit. The Christmas season begins with Advent and ends with the baptism of the Lord. Easter begins at Ash Wednesday and culminates with Pentecost. The remainder of the year is called ordinary time. Sunday liturgy is the principal occasion to commemorate the paschal mystery of Christ. The three-year lectionary cycle presents the important narratives of the Christian story and nourishes the memory of the Christian community. Special feastdays commemorate the lives of holy women and men, saints and martyrs, who exemplify one or another aspect of the Christian life. Other solemnities and feasts (e.g., Corpus Christi) highlight a revered theme within Christianity or a particular aspect of the life of Christ or of Mary. The liturgical year is “trinitarian” precisely in its concreteness, in the way that it binds Christian memory and ritual gesture to the events by which God comes to us in word and Spirit.

Sacraments of Initiation. Through sacraments of initiation, believers are united to the very life of God. Baptism into the threefold name of God, Father, Son and Spirit (Mt 28:19) is the primary symbol of trinitarian faith. To be baptized into the name of God means to identify with the history and presence and activity of that name, past, present and future. By “putting on Christ” we are made into a “new creation”; persons are brought into right relationship with themselves, with each other, with creation, and with God. Old patterns of alienating and unjust relationships (Jew-Greek, slave-free, male-female) are abolished; Christ is the model for the right relationships of the kingdom of God.

Baptism inaugurates the deifying work of the Spirit who perfects the image of God in us. Even though the fullness of the Spirit is bestowed at baptism, many churches administer confirmation as a separate sacrament of initiation. What is important to remember is that Christian baptism is always into Christ and the Spirit. A more adequate trinitarian theology and pneumatology, in which Christ and the Spirit are always seen as two essential poles in the economy of salvation, is the key to an adequate sacramental theology and pastoral practice for both baptism and confirmation.

The eucharist is a central means of participation in the trinitarian life of God. The very act of “eucharist” which means “thanksgiving” indicates the proper attitude of the Christian who acknowledges the redeeming power of God in Christ.

Many eucharistic rites open with the benediction of 2 Cor 13:13: “May the grace (and peace) of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit, be with you all.” The invocation signals that what is about to take place in the eucharist is possible only if we dwell in God and God in us. This encounter with a personal God brings about both our union with God and our communion with each other.

In the eucharistic prayer we give thanks for what God has done in salvation history, especially in Christ. Following the words of institution and the memorial acclamation, the Holy Spirit is "called down upon these gifts to make them holy" (epiclesis) and, in some rites, the Spirit is also called down upon the community. The eucharistic prayer ends with the Per Ipsum: "Through him, with him, in him, in the unity of the Holy Spirit, all glory and honor is yours, Almighty Father, both now and forever." Finally, the eucharistic celebration ends with the missionary charge to "go in peace to love and serve God." The Spirit-constituted community of the baptized, who no longer distinguish themselves from each other on the basis of race, gender or position, is charged with the mission of living out in the world its new relational life of intimacy with the God of Jesus Christ. This sending forth of each Christian reflects the eternal missions of Word and Spirit who also are sent by God to reveal God's face to the world.

Doxologies. Trinitarian doctrine developed in part in the 4th century as a solution to various theological controversies which were generated by different interpretations of Christian worship. Early doxologies directed praise to God through Christ the mediator (cf. Eph 5:20; 1 Cor 15:57; Col 3:17; Rom 1:8, 16:27, 7:25; 2 Cor 1:20; Heb 13:15; 1 Pet 4:11). The mediatory pattern of prayer is also found in the anaphoral portions of virtually all extant liturgical texts of the pre-Nicene church. The emphasis on the mediatory role of Christ was used by Arian theologians to support their view that Christ is inferior to God. Reciting the doxologies soon became an occasion to express doctrinal convictions. Basil (d. 374) formulated a new doxology: "to God the Father with (meta) the Son, together with (sun) the Holy Spirit." In defense of his innovation he wrote a treatise, On the Holy Spirit. To avoid any suggestion of Arianism, doxologies eventually followed the non-mediatory form in which Christ and the Spirit are praised together with God the Father.

Today's liturgy retains both forms of the doxology; the mediatory form is found in the Per Ipsum; the coordinated form is also recited: "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit . . ." Both forms of the doxology are appropriate, provided that they enable us to direct our praise to God from whom all things come and for whom all things are destined.

Creeds. The original setting of early Christian creeds was the administration of baptism. The form of the creeds was interrogatory; the candidate for baptism was asked three questions: Do you believe in God, the Father Almighty? Do you believe in Christ Jesus, Son of God . . . ? Do you believe in the Holy Spirit . . . ? The triple interrogation was followed by a triple affirmation, and a triple immersion in water, all to reflect the trinitarian pattern of Christian faith. Declaratory creeds (which typically begin, "I believe in . . .") also display a trinitarian ground-plan, since each article of the creed focuses on one of the divine persons.

Creeds are living statements of faith whose purpose is primarily doxological and only secondarily didactic. The two creeds most commonly used in connection with baptism, the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, are largely narratives of salvation history. The Creed was in fact called a "symbol" (symbolum), a sign or token reminder of the God into whose name Christians were baptized. The Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed is now recited at the eucharist, reminding us of our trinitarian faith; in God who is source of all that is; in Jesus Christ who was born, suffered, died, was raised for our salvation and who will stand as judge over all at the end-time, in the Spirit who spoke through the prophets and whose ongoing presence is associated with the life of the church, who is now leading us through Christ back to God.

In sum, the connection between "Trinity and liturgy" is rooted above all in the economy of salvation. The God we praise is God who comes to us in Christ and the Spirit. The purpose of the doctrine is to articulate the meaning and nature of the God who comes to us in Christ and the Spirit.

See Baptism; Doxology; Creed, praying the

CATHERINE MOWRY LACUGNA

TRINITY SUNDAY

The Feast of Trinity Sunday is celebrated on the first Sunday after Pentecost (in the Byzantine rite the Feast of the Trinity is Pentecost Sunday). Although the Feast of Trinity Sunday was initially resisted by Rome, several elements of the feast predate its formal institution in 1334.

History of the Feast. In the Gelasian Sacramentary (8th cent.) are found the preface and collect which later became part of the Mass for that day (A. Chavasse, Le Sacramentaire Gélisien [Tournai, 1958] 254-262). This preface was probably drawn up in the 5th century, in a Roman milieu, under the influence of Leo the Great. There are three versions of the preface, one Roman and two Mozarabic; the Roman version is the original. The preface is primarily doctrinal and abstract, focusing on the inner relations among Father, Son and Spirit.

At the end of the 8th century Alcuin composed a votive Mass for the Trinity (Liber Sacramentorum, p.L. 150,445).

Stephen, Bishop of Liege (903-920), wrote a complete office for the Sunday after Pentecost. This Sunday had been a Dominica vacat (no special office existed), since the preceding Saturday was ordination day. Stephen's move was resisted by Rome. Pope Alexander II (d. 1073) refused the petition for a special feast and remarked that the Roman church daily honored the Trinity in psalmody and in the Gloria Patri. The feast was rejected also by Bernhold of Constance (d. 1100) in the Micrologies (Micrologus). Subsequent popes were also opposed to the feast, but in 1251 Pope Innocent IV visited Trinity church in Krahan and authorized an indulgence of 400 days for observing the feast. The Synod of Arles adopted the feast in 1260; the Order of Cîteaux also adopted it in 1271, as Cluny had earlier. A new office had been composed by John Peckam, Canon of Lyons and later Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1292). In 1334, during his exile in Avignon, Pope John XXII approved the feast and extended it to the whole church.

Trinity Sunday had been a double of the second class but was raised to a primary of the first class by Pius X in 1911. Trinity Sunday is known as an "idea feast," since it commemorates not an event in salvation history but a particular aspect of doctrine. The reform of the liturgy reduced the number of idea feasts, showing a preference for more event-centered feastdays. Trinity Sunday remains one of the nine solemnities of the church calendar, along with Corpus Christi (estab. in 1264), Sacred Heart of Jesus (1856), Holy Family (1921), Christ the King (1925), Motherhood of Mary (1931), Immaculate Conception (1863), Assumption (1950), Joseph, Husband of Mary (14th cent.).

Cycle of Readings. From the 10th century until the introduction of the three-year lectionary cycle, the readings for Trinity Sunday in the Missale Romanum were Rom 11:33-36 and Mt

28:18-20. Today, the readings for Cycle A are Exod 34:4-6, 8-9; 2 Cor 13:11-13; Jn 3:16-18; for Cycle B, Deut 4:32-34, 39-40; Rom 8:14-17; Mt 28:16-20; for Cycle C, Prov 8:22-31; Rom 5:15; Jn 16:12-15.

Preaching on Trinity Sunday. The new cycle of readings provides a rich source for homilies on Trinity Sunday. The focus should be the mystery of redemption by God through Christ in the power of the Holy Spirit, as well as its consequences for Christian life. Preachers need not use the technical language of dogma (e.g., hypostasis) nor is it necessarily desirable to explain particular trinitarian theories, even those of Augustine and the church councils. Since liturgy is the ritual celebration of the events of the economy of salvation, preaching on Trinity Sunday should concentrate on the concrete reality of grace and divine love in the economy of salvation.

A. Adam, The Liturgical Year (New York: Pueblo, 1981). F. Cabrol, "Le Culte de la Trinité dans la liturgie de la fête de la Trinité," Ephemerides Liturgicae 45 (1931): 270-278. L.-A. Gignac, "Liturgie liturgique. La préface de la Trinité," Fête de la Sainte Trinité, in Assemblées du Seigneur 53 (1970): 7-12. C.M. LaCugna, "Making the Most of Trinity Sunday," Worship 60 (1986): 210-224.

CATHERINE MOWRY LACUGNA

V

VALIDITY, SACRAMENTAL

The term valid, when applied to a sacrament, names both its truth, authenticity and effectiveness in itself and its recognition as true, authentic and effective by the church. Sacramental validity is therefore both a theological reality and a canonical judgment.

The theological reality is determined by the mystery of Jesus Christ. As such, it is not historically conditioned, except insofar as Jesus Christ is himself, by the incarnation, an element in human history. True sacraments continue the incarnation of Christ. The canonical judgment, on the other hand, is made by the church in light of its understanding of the mystery of Christ, an understanding that can shift and grow over time. Because the canonical judgment is determined by human understanding of the mystery of Christ, it is subject to historical variation.

Since the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy maintains that all liturgy "expresses the mystery of Christ" (S.C., 2), the church must determine the validity of sacraments to the extent that they truly express, or fail to express, this mystery. Yet, since the mystery itself can be variously understood at different periods of the church's life, its judgment of validity will always be subject to change. Witness, for just two examples, the redefinition of essentials in the current reform in regard to ordination (the laying on of hands rather than the assignment of instruments of office) and confirmation (the adoption of the Eastern form of prayer, "N., be sealed with the gift of the Holy Spirit," in preference to the classic Western form, "I sign you with the sign of the cross and anoint you with the chrism of salvation . . ."). Such changes are not arbitrary; they reflect a deeper understanding of the Christ mystery itself. As Paul VI announced in his Apostolic Constitution on the Sacrament of Confirmation (1971): "As regards the words which are pronounced in confirmation, we have examined with due consideration the dignity of the venerable formula used in the Latin Church, but we judge preferable the very ancient formula belonging to the Byzantine rite, by which the Gift of the Holy Spirit himself is expressed and the outpouring of the Spirit which took place on the day of Pentecost is recalled (see Acts 2:1-4, 38). We therefore adopt this formula, rendering it almost word for word."

A.-G. Martimort advises that "an act is valid that has been truly carried out, that does not have to be repeated, and that is in itself capable of producing its proper effects" (The Signs of the New Covenant, Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1963, p. 42, n. 14). He goes on to say that the sign must be "effectively constituted" in such a way that the sacramental grace is offered (res et sacramentum) even if it is not, due to some defect on the part of the recipient, freely received (res). The determining factor for validity on the part of the church is the presentation through sacramental signs of the saving grace of Christ to one who is capable of receiving that grace.

Vatican II noted that "it (the liturgy) involves the presentation of man's sanctification under the guise of signs perceptible to the senses and its accomplishment in ways appropriate to each of these signs" (S.C., 7). The liturgical reform which the council set in motion was determined that "both texts and rites should be drawn up so as to express more clearly the holy things which they signify" (S.C., 21). "The rites should be distinguished by a noble simplicity. They should be short, clear, and free from useless repetitions. They should be within the people's powers of comprehension, and normally should not require much explanation" (S.C., 34). This concern for clear signification was the practical outcome of the theological concern that the mystery of Christ be honestly expressed and his saving grace be truly and effectively presented.

It is probably the case that the sharp line drawn between valid and invalid is no longer the most helpful way to assess the truth or untruth of sacraments. Both are minimalist judgments: either the essentials are there or not. They are also judgments which presume we can have a clear understanding of what the essentials are. That is in fact not as easy as might ordinarily be assumed. Nonetheless, even where the essentials are judged to be present, there is a large spectrum of sacramental truth that stretches between the "bare necessities," and the full liturgical action envisioned by Vatican II. Minimalist judgments are not adequate to the Vatican II liturgical reform.

On the other hand, even where the essentials are judged not to be present, it is difficult to dismiss the act as empty and without sacramental value; defective, perhaps, but not without value. The judgment of invalidity implicit in marriage annulment, for example, is proving pastorally problematic to many who find it far more truthful to their experience to say that their marriage died or fell apart than that it never existed in the first place. Similarly, especially in this ecumenical era, the Roman Catholic judgment that Anglican orders are "null and void" (Leo XIII), or the Orthodox judgment that Catholic confirmation is ineffective, rings more untrue than true. It may be proper for Roman Catholics to re-ordain priests who come to the Roman church from Anglicanism, and it may be proper for Orthodox to chrismate (confirm) Roman Catholics who enter Orthodoxy, but this could be done for reasons other than that the original ordination or confirmation was null and void. Repetition does not necessarily indicate original invalidity.

Vatican II did in fact retreat from the clear and harsh judgments of earlier days. With regard to realities within other churches, and in its desire to promote Christian unity, rather than stall or hinder it, the council advised that every effort be taken "to avoid expressions, judgments and actions which do not represent the condition of our separated brethren with truth and fairness" (U.R., 4). And with regard to its own sacramental life, it set down norms for adaptation, versatility and development that potentially, at least, could give the "essentials" so many ritual faces that it will be discovered that the "essentials" are not linked to any specific ritual form (see, Amaladoss).

Nonetheless, the church does have both the right and the responsibility to make judgments, however historically conditioned they might be, that "this act" is in conformity with the truth of Christ and "that act" is not. Such judgment is important for people; it is important for a proper unfolding of a healthy liturgical life. What is required, however, for this judgment to be made with gospel integrity, is that the church stand humbly before Christ's truth; especially as that truth may manifest itself in the lives of those whose actions are called into question, and pass such judgment softly and tentatively, and only with the deep desire that the mystery of Christ be truly expressed and the mission of Christ be sacramentally set forth and effectively accomplished.

See Law, liturgical; Sacraments

Michael Amaladoss, Do Sacraments Change? (Bangalore: Theological Publications in India, 1979). Karl Rahner, "The Abiding Significance of Vatican II," in Theological Investigations (11)XX (New York: Crossroad, 1981): 90-102. Karl Rahner, "What is a Sacrament?", in II XIV (New York: Seabury, 1976): 135-148.

PETER E. FINK, S.J.

VATICAN II, LITURGICAL REFORM OF

See Reform, liturgical of Vatican II; Documents, Roman liturgical, since Vatican II

VESSELS, SACRED

Receptacles which contain elements used in Christian worship can be called sacred vessels. They are considered sacred because they are set aside for the worship of God. Some Christian denominations require particular blessing prayers by an ordained minister as part of a ritual signification of these vessels as sacred.

Some of the many vessels used in Christian worship are: the chalice, paten, ciborium, pyx, monstrance, censer, cruets, aspergillum, ambry, tabernacle, reliquary, etc.

Chalice

The word chalice is derived from the Latin term calix which means cup. This sacred vessel is the only one explicitly mentioned in each of the four scriptural accounts of the Lord's Supper. Evidence suggests that the form of the chalice probably developed from the cup of Aegean culture. One could reasonably suppose that the cup which Jesus used at the Supper was the ordinary two-handled cup in use at the time in that part of the world. In which case it would have been derived from the Roman drinking bowl and the two-handled cup of the Greeks. This style of chalice can be seen today in the mosaics at San Vitale in Ravenna, dating from at least the 6th century, as well as at St. Mark's in Venice.

From the early days of Christianity chalices were fashioned from various materials: wood, glass, horn, gold, copper, silver. During the first Christian millennium, persistent efforts were made to retain the use of common substances in the design of chalices. Not only was there a need to respect the limits of poorer worshipping communities, but also a recurring desire to avoid the appearance of luxury. For example, St. Clement of Alexandria (3rd century) vigorously opposed the use of precious stones, gold and silver. Sts. Chrysostom and Ambrose (4th century) and Boniface (8th century) also spoke out in this regard. There were numerous stories of saints who melted their chalices and gave the proceeds to the poor, for instance, Sts. Lawrence, Augustine, Gregory, Hilary of Arles, Exupere.

While poorer materials were frequently used in chalices, there was a tendency from the beginning to use precious substances for vessels designed for the most significant act of worship in the Christian life. This tendency was especially evident with the legal and consequent popular recognition of Christianity by Emperor Constantine, who furthered the impetus toward the use of precious metals such as gold and silver and the use of precious gems and other substances for ornamentation. From at least the 8th and 9th centuries the church prohibited substances other than the precious metals of gold or at least silver. For example, the Council of Calchyth (787) forbade the use of horn and Leo IV (847) and later the Council of Tribur (897) forbade the use of wood and glass.

Sometimes chalices were designed of such size and weight that they were intended to be positioned near the altar for decoration and not for use during a eucharist. The gold chalices given by Charlemagne at his coronation exemplify this custom.

Two additional kinds of chalices were used in the early medieval period in the Western church: the ministerial chalice (calix ministerialis) and the offering chalice (calix offertorialis). The former was a cup usually with two handles for distribution of eucharistic wine to the entire assembly; the latter was a larger cup into which the assembly poured their contributions of wine. The chalice used for consecration was smaller since it was used for communion of the presider. Since by the 9th century communion of the laity was no longer the customary practice, only the chalice of the priest remained.

Emphasis upon ornamentation of the chalice continued through the High Middle Ages, Renaissance and Baroque periods. Distinctive styles developed in various regions of the world, while almost always maintaining the common shape (base, knob and bowl). With the Reformation, the recovered emphasis upon participation of the laity in the eucharist modified the chalice to provide once again for the communion of all who worshipped in the reformed Christian traditions. Due to the English Reformation, even the name of chalice was modified to the communion cup for denominations who followed this Christian tradition.

In the reform of liturgy in the Roman Catholic church since the Second Vatican Council, the design of the chalice deserves special care. It should be made of high quality material and capable of bearing mystery so as to communicate the central significance of this symbol. While precious metals are often used in chalices, they are not required for them (not even gold-plated lining for the cup). Reception of both the eucharistic bread and wine at Mass is recommended as the fuller expression and cultivation of the primary symbolic actions of eating and drinking at the table of the Lord. Therefore a chalice large enough for the entire assembly or a flagon of wine which is poured into additional cups/chalices during the fraction rite is preferable at each eucharist. The number and the design of these cups depends on the size and the cultural sensibilities of the assembly. Duplication of symbols is discouraged as well as any design or decoration which impedes the renewed emphasis upon the action of the assembly.

Paten

The word paten comes from the Greek word patane meaning dish or plate. This vessel used in Christian worship is the container for the bread at the celebration of the eucharist. It is likely that Jesus used the ordinary domestic vessel of the time for the bread at the Lord's Supper. The early centuries of Christians used patens of various sizes and shapes, but many were large and deep so that they could contain the loaves of bread brought by those who arrived for worship. Like the chalice, it is probable that there were two types of patens—one for the presider and one for distribution to the assembly at communion. Blue molten glass seems to have been a customary material for many early patens. For instance St. Zephyrinus (3rd century) prescribed a glass paten with handles. Also St. Caesarius (6th century) justifies his selling of some sacred vessels made of precious metal by saying that Jesus was content to use a dish of glass.

Following the conversion of Constantine, there was a growing emphasis upon the use of precious metals and other valued materials. For example, in the Liber Pontificalis (a collection of early papal biographies) some patens are described as being made of silver and gold and bordered with precious stones and pearls. Medieval patens varied in design and decoration from one region to another. By the 9th century, the reception of communion by the entire assembly became infrequent. In addition, the Western church required the use of wafer bread rather than leavened bread by the end of the 9th century. These factors affected the consequent size of the paten. The circular shape with a wide rim and a depression in the center was customary and eventually regulated.

The Reformation restored regular reception of the eucharistic bread by all, including the laity. In England the use of leavened bread was reintroduced. These developments required the redesign of a communion plate (paten) which could contain enough eucharistic bread for all the assembly to receive.

Early in the 20th century Roman Catholics were also encouraged to receive communion frequently. The Roman Catholic liturgical reformation since the Second Vatican Council recommended that Catholics use bread that looks and tastes more like food. Since this could well involve larger quantities of bread than hosts, the size of patens/dishes/baskets has varied depending upon the size of the assembly. In all cases, high quality materials and artistic expression capable of bearing mystery are the norm.

Ciborium

This Christian worship vessel contains bread to be consecrated at eucharist or bread already consecrated from a previous eucharist. The origin of the word is debated. Some say the etymology of this Latin term refers to a Byzantine canopy over an altar; some say it emanates from the Latin cibus meaning food. The ciborium developed from the pyx in the 13th century. It would be used in addition to a paten if the amount of communion bread needed for a service was more than the paten could hold. This is the way ciboria are used today.

In addition to its original purpose, the ciborium was used to reserve some of the eucharistic bread for use outside the eucharistic celebration. At first this reserved consecrated bread was used to bring communion to those who could not worship with the gathered assembly, for example, the dying and seriously ill. Later the reserved sacrament in the ciborium was also used as an object of veneration. By at least the 12th century, ciboria were sometimes suspended in accord with the custom of protecting food.

As mentioned earlier, reception of communion became infrequent. Eucharistic bread previously consecrated and reserved in a ciborium was used for distribution of communion to the assembly at Mass. The size of many ciboria was large and the shape often resembled a cup with a lid. Often this cup and lid were decorated with lavish ornamentation. This size and shape of ciboria perdured until the Reformers eliminated this practice of distributing communion from a previous eucharist. Likewise the Roman Catholic church has discouraged this practice since her contemporary liturgical renewal, with the result that the size and shape of ciboria vary depending primarily upon the needs of the worshipping assembly.

Pyx

The word pyx comes from the Greek pyxis meaning wooden box and the Latin pyxis meaning a small box. The pyx is a Christian worship vessel which contains some of the consecrated bread from a eucharist. The original purpose for the vessel was to contain communion to be brought to those who could not gather for eucharist due to sickness, bitter persecution, imprisonment, etc. This custom is described as early as the middle of the 2nd century by Justin Martyr in his Apology I. 65. By the later Middle Ages the term pyx also began to designate a receptacle for a large host which was placed in a monstrance for veneration.

Originally the pyx was made of wood, glass, enamel, ivory, metals, parchment or linen. Today the pyx (for carrying the eucharistic bread) is frequently made of metal, but various other materials are used as well. The pyx for a monstrance contains at least a facade of glass in order to view the host easily.

Monstrance

This Christian worship vessel was designed in response to the devotion to the Blessed Sacrament which spread in the later Middle Ages. The veneration of the eucharist in the closed ciborium gave way to a monstrance so that the host could be seen. Another name for the monstrance is ostensorium, from the Latin ostentare meaning to display. The development of the personal devotion to the consecrated host came to calendrical expression in the 14th-century Feast of Corpus Christi. The monstrance with the host was carried in procession as well as prominently positioned in the church for veneration in special services. These services developed into benediction or exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, as this liturgy is also called.

Censer

This Christian worship vessel which is used to incense people, places and things is sometimes called a thurible, from the Latin thus, meaning incense. The use of incense in worship antedates Christianity. When it was introduced into Christian worship in the 4th century, Christians used the same kind of vessel, usually clay pots or metal pots with perforated lids (by the Middle Ages), and sometimes with a chain for swinging. Since the 12th century an accompanying vessel shaped something like a boat was called by the Latin terms navis or navicula, meaning ship or skiff.

Cruets

These two vessels used in Christian worship contain the wine and water to be used in the celebration of a eucharist. The term comes from the medieval French term cruette meaning a little jug. They are made of many materials, e.g., glass, metal, clay, ceramic, etc. During the High Middle Ages and well into the 17th and 18th centuries the design of some cruets was richly ornamented, yet with the intent of not competing in importance with the chalice and paten. Some of the Reformers wanted cruets eliminated from the celebration of Mass; some wanted their design simplified. In the recent Roman Catholic liturgical reformation, little is expressed other than that their quality and appropriate design convey the importance of the ritual action being celebrated.

Aspergillum

Derived from the Latin word aspergere which means to spray or to sprinkle, this vessel is used in Christian worship to sprinkle the assembly with water to remind all of their baptism. This container is either filled from the baptismal font or filled before a ceremony and then blessed during it.

The origins of an asperges rite are clouded. Psalm 50 and Ezekiel 47 seem to indicate a pre-Christian ritual sprinkling. The early Christian writings about the celebration of the paschal vigil contain a blessing of the baptismal waters and consequent contact with the water. It is probable that the custom of a Sunday asperges rite developed from the medieval practice of blessing the monastery on that day. Currently in the reformed Roman Catholic liturgy, the sprinkling of the assembly, reminiscent of baptism, is the first option presented for the introductory rites in order to help the assembly gather and to prepare them to hear the word of God and celebrate eucharist.

Ambry

The term for this Christian worship object is derived from the Latin armarium meaning a cupboard or chest. This is a special place to hold materials used in Christian worship, such as oils, consecrated bread from a eucharist, etc. The ambry could be a niche in a wall or a cupboard or, as early as the 6th century, we find evidence that ambries were placed in the base of altars. Sometimes the ambry had a door or doors, sometimes not. By the early 13th century, Innocent III decreed that eucharistic ambries must be locked. With the increase of devotion to the eucharist, these ambries were eventually placed in more prominent locations in the church. The eucharistic ambry developed into the tabernacle by the 16th century. Currently an ambry is sometimes used as a special cupboard for the oils used in the celebration of sacraments.

Tabernacle

Derived from the Latin tabernaculum meaning tent, this Christian vessel recalls the Jewish "meeting tent" which housed the Ark and was believed to embody the presence of God among people. The Christian tabernacle contains the consecrated bread from a eucharist. This term was introduced by Bishop Matthew Giberti of Verona in 1525 and ratified by the Council of Trent. Reserving some of the eucharist for those who could not attend the actual celebration of eucharist, for example, for the sick and the imprisoned, was a custom since the early church. Between the 2nd and 4th centuries Justin, Tertullian, Cyprian and Basil have frequent references. Sometimes the eucharist was kept in the sacristy; sometimes in the church in a fixed ambry or in a pyx shaped as a casket, tower, or dove, which could be taken to those who could not attend.

Even though reception of communion became infrequent during the Middle Ages, devotion to the eucharist grew. A reverence for the eucharist culminated in the establishment of the feast of Corpus Christi in the 14th century. By the 16th century, reserving some previously consecrated eucharist on the main altar in a fixed tabernacle became customary. The general prescription appeared in the 1614 Roman Ritual.

Today the normative guideline of the Roman Catholic church is that the tabernacle rest upon a pillar or in a niche, but not upon the altar where the eucharistic action takes place. The tabernacle should be dignified and properly ornamented, but no specific materials are required for its construction. As has been the custom for centuries, a lamp should burn continuously near the tabernacle to indicate the presence of the consecrated eucharist.

Reliquary

This Christian worship object contains relics. The earliest reliquaries contained fragments of Jesus' cross, which reportedly was found in the 4th century. These receptacles took a variety of shapes: caskets, crosses, rings, boxes, buildings, ampullae, shapes of parts of the body, encolpia, etc., and they were made of precious materials of every kind, especially metals. During the Middle Ages a popular devotion to revere a piece of the body of a saint (sometimes the entire body) or the saint's clothing became customary. During the later Middle Ages the monstrance also carried relics to embellish the ritual exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. The design and ornamentation of reliquaries vary considerably depending upon the period and country.

The Reformers found the emphasis upon devotion to the saints intolerable. In the recent liturgical reform of the Roman Catholic church, reliquaries continue to afford a respected place among objects used in Christian worship, but they are never to be placed upon the altar or even set into the table of the altar.

National Conference of Catholic Bishops, Environment and Art in Catholic Worship (Washington: United States Catholic Conference Publications, 1978). F.L. Cross and E.A. Livingston, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1978). A.A. King and C.E. Pocknee, Eucharistic Reservation in the Western Church (London: Mowbray 1965). H. Kaufmann et al., Eucharistic Vessels of the Middle Ages (Cambridge: Busch-Reisinger Museum, 1975). J. Hazelden-Walker, "Reflections on the Earliest Vessels Used for Transportation of the Reserved Sacrament," Studia Liturgica 16:3-4 (1986-1987): 93-103. J. Hazelden-Walker, "Reservation Vessels in the Earliest Roman Liturgy," Studia Patristica 15:1 (1984): 568-572. J. Huels, "Trent and the Chalice: Forerunner of Vatican II?" Worship 56:5 (1982): 386-400.

I. JEROME OVERBECK, S.J.

VESTMENTS, LITURGICAL

Just as any clothing manifests the person who wears it, so likewise does the church in the liturgy disclose its inner mystery through the wearing of special, liturgical vestments. An understanding of the liturgy therefore necessarily includes some knowledge of the history and meaning of liturgical clothing. The purpose of this article, then, is to outline the (1) historical origins and development, (2) use of colors, and (3) theological meaning of the major vestments of the Roman rite.

I. Origins and Development

Scholars agree that in the first centuries of Christianity liturgical clothing in no way differed in form from that worn by people in ordinary life. When it did differ, it did so only in quality of material and/or in cleanliness. Thus Clement of Alexandria (d. ca. 215) calls for clothes that are both clean and bright. And Jerome (d. 420) states, "We ought not to enter into the holy of holies in our everyday garments, just as we please, when they have become defiled from the use of ordinary life, but with a clean conscience and in clean garments hold in our hands the sacraments of the Lord" (In Ezek 44:17ff.).

If every Christian in the early church was expected to celebrate in clean, bright garments, even more so did bishops, presbyters and deacons "dress up" for the liturgy. Origen (d. 253) states that the bishop wears one set of clothes in "the ministry of the sacrifices" and another when he moves out among his people (In Lev. hom. 4.6). Jerome adds that it does not dishonor God—rather, just the opposite—if clerics at the liturgy wear white tunics more handsome than normal (Adv. Pelag., 1.4). The Canons of Hippolytus prescribe that the ordained and the lectors "be dressed in white vestments more beautiful than the rest of the people" (Can. 37). Such garments were normally made of whitened linen, the fabric the OT prescribes for high priestly vestments (Lev 16:4). On the other hand, since the Bible links death to sin, writers such as Jerome and Augustine argued that furs or hides, taken from dead animals, ought not be used in the liturgy. In fact, even wool, because it comes from a mortal animal, was sometimes avoided.

Although church leaders in the early church were repeatedly encouraged to place more importance on adorning their souls with noble virtues than their bodies with precious clothing, two factors especially led to the establishment of a special kind of liturgical garb. The first factor was the Roman legalization of Christianity in the 4th century when the Emperor Constantine honored bishops on the level of civil magistrates. Senatorial sandals, the dalmatic and the ceremonial pallium all became signs of their office. The second factor was a dramatic shift in the style of men's secular clothing during the 5th and 6th centuries. When Germanic tribes invaded Rome, they brought their custom of wearing trousers, a type of clothing dictated by harsher northern climates. Although the clergy adapted to the times, yet, as normally happens in festive situations across all cultures, at the celebration of the liturgy church leaders continued to wear their traditional clothes. Later there developed the additional practice, as recorded by the synod of Narbonne in 589, of wearing liturgical vestments over one's ordinary clothes. Consequently, most of today's liturgical vestments can still trace a direct lineage back to the everyday clothing of imperial Rome.

A. Alb. Ancient Mediterranean clothing could be categorized into two basic types: (1) clothes that one "puts on" (indumenta), and (2) clothes that one "wraps around" (amictus) the body. For the Greeks the first type—vertical, form-fitting clothing—expressed the bodily, material part of the human being. The second type, circling the body around the head as its focal point, symbolized the human being's spiritual transcendence to a merely physical world.

An example of the first type of clothing, the alb ("white") derives from the old Roman tunica. Itself a descendent of the classical Greek chiton, the tunic originated as a rectangular piece of woolen fabric wrapping horizontally around the body and reaching to the knees. It was girded at the waist and held by clasps from each shoulder. In time, first the open side and then the shoulder-joints were either woven or sewn together, leaving openings for the head and arms. The Roman tunica talaris was the longer version of the same garment reaching down to the feet.

As is evidenced in Christian catacomb frescoes and mosaic art, the Romans overcame the visual monotony of the tunic's solid light color with two vertically parallel reddish or purple stripes called clavi, i.e., "spikes." These stripes, whether woven into or sewn onto the tunic, ran top to bottom, front and back, over each shoulder. Some scholars conjecture that the liturgical stole developed as an extension of this ancient ornamentation.

In general the Romans disdained sleeves, a characteristic to them of barbarian clothing, but in 270 the Emperor Aurelian broke down this resistance by presenting the sleeved tunic (tunica manicata) to his friends. This modification completed the basic form of today's liturgical alb (tunica alba).

With the renewed practice of concelebration and a greater differentiation of ministries in the liturgy since Vatican II, the alb has developed toward two separate styles: (1) the wider, traditional under-garment, gathered at the waist with a cincture, to be worn beneath the dalmatic, chasuble or cope; and (2) the heavier, more elegant outer-garment, without cincture but hanging in straight vertical folds, with full sleeves and a close-fitting collar, to be worn as the external garment.

B. Dalmatic. In the late 2nd century another version of the tunic, the dalmatic (tunica dalmatica), was introduced from Dalmatia. Originally a calf-length fine woolen tunic, worn without cincture and with wide, generous sleeves, the dalmatic was despised at first because of its sleeves. But when the emperor Heliogabulus (218-222) entered Rome in triumph dressed in a dalmatic, it became popular among the senatorial class. Eusebius (d. 340) states that bishop Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258) before his martyrdom removed both an outer mantle and the dalmatic he wore over an underlying linen tunic (linea) (Eccl. Hist., IV, 2). By the 4th century, as signs of their office, civil magistrates were arrayed in fine quality dalmatics of silk, wool or a mixture of the two (subserica). Constantine also granted this honor to major Christian bishops. The Liber Pontificalis states that Pope Sylvester (314-335) began the practice of conferring dalmatics on papal deacons as well. Three centuries later, in the time of Gregory the Great (590-604), the dalmatic, worn under the chasuble, remained a privilege of the pope, which he bestowed sometimes on other archbishops, but which normally he reserved to himself and to his deacons at Rome (see Ep. ex Reg. 3.2). Only in the 11th century was it definitively prescribed as a liturgical garment for all bishops and deacons. In later times, made heavy and thick with rich ornamentation, the dalmatic sometimes exchanged its sleeves for shoulder pieces, and left open slits on the sides for easier vesting and movement. The dalmatic today is the characteristic outer vestment for deacons alone and ought to be worn at all Sunday and feast day liturgical celebrations.

C. Pallium. From at least the 6th century B.C. onwards the himation was worn by Greek men. This was an oblong piece of clothing, approximately 6 by 18 feet, draped from front to back over the left shoulder, around and under the right arm, across the front and then over the left arm, leaving the right arm free. Whereas most men wore the himation over a chiton, philosophers and thinkers marked the divine simplicity of their lives by wearing it as their only outer garment. In the Roman world the himation was called the pallium (= "a cut of cloth"?). Because of its association with humility and holiness, Tertullian (d. ca. 220) argued that the pallium signified Christ, and therefore was more befitting for Christians than the pretentious Roman toga (De Pallio, 6; C.C. 2:750).

Early catacomb art attests to its popularity among Christians. In fact, throughout history Christ himself has regularly been pictured wearing the ancient pallium. In ordinary life, however, by the 4th and 5th centuries the pallium was replaced by the even more practical tunica dalmatica and paenula. It survived briefly in Roman society no longer as functional clothing, but only as an ornamental insignia, shrunken to a narrow woolen band draped from left front to back and looped once again around the neck. This ceremonial pallium was used to indicate high civil office, and so Constantine granted it to bishops of major sees as well. The Liber Pontificalis records that Pope Mark (d. 336) signified his pre-eminence among church authorities in the West by conferring the pallium on his suffragan, the bishop of Ostia.

Early on, the pope bestowed the pallium only on especially notable bishops of major sees (e.g., Arles, Ravenna), but by the 9th century all Latin rite archbishops and metropolitans were allowed to wear it within their own domains as a sign of their pastoral office. Explaining the wool pallium on the shoulders of the bishop as the lost sheep carried by "a type of Christ," Isidore of Pelusium (ca. 412) introduced a liturgical mystagogy which has survived to this day (Epp. 1.136). From this symbolism arose the tradition that pallia be woven by the nuns of St. Cecilia's convent in Rome from pure white wool taken from blessed lambs. A series of six purple crosses were later added, making more explicit the symbolic connection between the pallium on the shoulders of the church's pastor and the "sweet yoke" of Christ's cross. By the 10th century the pallium was given the double front and back Y-shape it has today, having the tips of its pendants weighted down with lead and covered in black silk.

In the past some confusion about the history of the pallium resulted from the fact that during the 5th and 6th centuries this same name was also used to denote the ascetical rough garment worn by Christian monks in imitation of John the Baptist. Thus when certain bishops in southern France began wearing the pallium, it was to this episcopal affectation of monastic virtue that Pope Celestine (d. 432) so strongly objected: "Why should the customary clothing worn by great bishops over many years be discarded for this garb? What ought to distinguish us from the laity and everyone else is right teaching, not garments; probity of life, not what we wear; purity of mind, not status symbols" (P.L. 67:274). Consequently, instead of objecting to the ceremonial pallium, Pope Celestine actually intends that his fellow bishops continue to wear such traditional clothing of good quality when celebrating the liturgy.

D. Chasuble, Cape. The chasuble, the outer liturgical vestment worn today by both bishops and priests, originated from the ancient Greco-Roman paenula (etym. unkn.). Popular among the lower classes, the paenula was an enveloping, poncho-like outdoor garment that reached down around the calves. It was normally made of skins or of rough, dark wool. For protection against the cold, the paenula might also include a cap (cucullus), either sewn on in the form of a cowl or completely detachable with long tabs to be wrapped around the neck for warmth. Constructed from more or less a semicircle of material, the paenula gathered around the body in a funnel-like, conical shape, and was either sewn together or left open in the front. The narrower, sewn paenula was known also as the casula (= chasuble), that is, "little house." When left open, it formed a cape-like garment, sometimes called the pluviale ("rain cape"), the probable origin of today's liturgical cope (cappa = "hooded mantle"). A larger paenula, the amphibalus, was made from up to a full circle of material (thus explaining how St. Martin of Tours could divide his cloak, give half [capella] to a beggar and still have enough to keep himself warm).

The paenula normally had no sleeves or arm-openings. Consequently, in order to handle anything the wearer of the closed paenula had to reach down on both sides until the hands became free. This action resulted in having extra material falling in beautiful, but heavy folds from each arm. To allow easier, less-encumbered use of the arms, the material used in later liturgical chasubles was sometimes cut back on the right side, often on both sides, or even in the front (e.g., the Eastern rite phelōnion). With these variations the once circular hemline now rose up and down around the person, inspiring Greek Christians, and later Latins as well, to call the chasuble "pianeta," i.e., "wanderer" (See Isidore, De Orig., 19.21). By the 4th century the chasuble became one's normal outer clothing both within and outside of the liturgy. The earliest evidence that it was required for bishops and priests comes from the 4th Council of Toledo (633). When in the Middle Ages the laity no longer understood liturgical Latin and the presider through most of the liturgy faced away from the people, the back of the chasuble was often decorated with symbols and images to provide a visual explanation of the sacred rites. From the 13th century onward, therefore, owing to its rich brocades and encrustations, sometimes the stiffness of the material so impeded the wearer's arm movements, especially at the elevation of the host, that both sides of the garment had to be reduced back to the shoulders. What resulted throughout Europe, along with the continued use of lighter, fuller chasubles, were national varieties of the sandwich-board vestment known today as the "Roman" chasuble.

In the 19th century a hybrid of the two styles was created by extending material down the arms from the shoulders of a "Roman" type, forming a chasuble mistakenly called "Gothic." It was so named in the belief that this style stemmed from what was considered to be that most authentic of all periods in church history (Sutfin, 86). With the return by Vatican II to early liturgical sources, chasubles in recent times have been fashioned as real clothing once again, reclaiming the shape of the ancient pianeta.

Today the chasuble remains the vestment proper to the bishop and priest celebrant at the Mass and at other rites immediately connected with the Mass. However, concelebrating priests are allowed for sufficient reason to wear only an alb and a stole (G.I.R.M., 161). The chasuble may replace the cope (1) during the sprinkling with holy water before Sunday Mass, (2) for the distribution of ashes at the beginning of Lent and (3) while performing the funeral absolution. Furthermore, the chasuble is to be worn over the alb and the stole (G.I.R.M., 299). The contrary practice of draping a large stole (sometimes even imitating the archbishop's yoked pallium) over the chasuble is not only a redundant sign of presbyteral office, but it obscures the noble simplicity and focusing function of the chasuble itself.

Recent attempts to simplify liturgical clothing have resulted in combinations of alb and chasuble forms in a single vestment. Thus, the "chasuble alb" has become popular. This extra wide alb is made normally of heavier material and has extended sleeves that droop in imitation of the falling lines of a chasuble. The "alb chasuble," on the other hand, begins with the chasuble form but is fashioned from the white, light material of the traditional alb. To be worn beneath properly colored stoles, these combinations are permitted for (1) concelebrating priests and (2) presiders at "Masses for particular groups" or when some other pastoral situation might warrant it (Notitiae 9:96-98). Because they reduce two traditional vestments into one, their regular use by the presider weakens the liturgy's symbol system, fostering a liturgical minimalism. Therefore they are not to be worn by the main celebrant under normal parish conditions, especially on Sundays or at other large celebrations.

E. Stole. The origin of the liturgical stole is uncertain. When first used in connection with the liturgy, the Greek word stole signified either "vestment" in general or that particular shawl-like garment shaped like the wrap which older Roman women typically wore around their shoulders (stola). Thus when Theodoret (d. 457) called the golden raiment for performing baptisms which Constantine gave Macarios of Jerusalem (d. 333) a "sacred stole" (hieran stolēn), he intended something more substantial than the narrow strip of cloth used in the liturgy today.

The "stole" worn today by deacons most probably derives from the ancient Roman orarium, a long towel for the hands and mouth (os, oris), carried or draped over the left shoulder, which in colder weather could also be used to keep the head or neck warm. Liturgical use in the East of the "orarion" is witnessed to as early as the council of Laodicea (372). And the Council of Braga (Spain) in 563 associates it with deacons who wore it like a waiter's towel in preparing gifts for the liturgy. Recalling an ancient symbolism, Germanus of Constantinople (d. 730) states that the oraria on the shoulders of deacons, waiters at the earthly liturgy, are like the wings of angels, those who serve the heavenly liturgy (Mustikē Theoria, 16). At the 4th council of Toledo (633), probably in imitation of the archbishop's wearing the pallium, the orarium, worn like the ancient stola or Jewish prayer shawl around one's neck, became required vesture for ordinary bishops and priests as well. Later, the Council of Mainz (813) insists that priests wear it at all times, even when travelling, as a sign of their office. Possibly because in the Middle Ages pastoral office in the church was often compared to OT priesthood, as early as Germanus of Paris (d. 576) the orarium became known as the "stola," the name given by the Septuagint to a high priestly garment. Traditionally worn by deacons over the left shoulder and crossing at the right hip, by priests and bishops looping around the back of the neck and falling from both shoulders straight down or crossing in the front, the stole has remained throughout the centuries a major, indispensable sign of ordained office in the church.

F. Maniple. The maniple (mappa, dim. = mappula) originated as a napkin and/or hand towel. Servants at table typically draped it over their left forearms. During the Roman empire it was also used decoratively and as a sign of authority. Emperors and consuls reportedly waved or dropped the maniple to start public games in the circus. In the 4th century Christian deacons covered their hands with this cloth when handling the sacred offerings at the liturgy. And in later centuries subdeacons as well were given the maniple as a sign of their office. Since the High Middle Ages it has been worn by all the major orders, attached to the left wrist and only during the celebration of the eucharist. With the reforms of Vatican II the maniple is no longer a required liturgical vestment.

G. Amice. The liturgical amice (amictus = "wrapped around") is an oblong linen cloth with long strings that is worn under the alb, wrapped about the neck and secured by its strings at the waist. Derived from a similar cut of cloth (superhumerales), which in Roman times was worn on top of the tunic to protect outer garments from perspiration, the amice became part of papal vesture in the 8th century. By the 12th century it was a common vestment for all liturgical ministers. Placed first on the head to protect the hair from dishevelment during subsequent vesting, then slid back, it formed a cowl-like collar around the neck. Today the amice is required only when the alb does not completely cover the street clothes underneath.

H. Mitre. In earlier centuries the clergy wore the common headgear of the day in outdoor liturgical activities such as processions. The first mention of any special head covering occurs in the 8th century when popes wore a cloth hat referred to as a "camelaucum," i.e., imperial crown. In "The Donation of Constantine," written between 757 and 767 and claiming to be a 4th-century document, Pope Sylvester refuses the crown which Constantine offers him as the "vicar of Christ." He accepts instead the simple white phrygian cap, called the "mitre," as a sign of his office. Inspired by this document and the passage in Exodus 39 granting the "mitra" to OT high priests, by the 12th century most other bishops and abbots as well had adopted the phrygium as part of their own insignia. In ancient Greek "mitra" referred to any kind of band, such as that which circled the crown of the head to make a cap fit snugly. Securing the bishop's hat, this band was tied in the back, with its two ends (fanons) falling loose from behind. A second band across the top of the head from front to back created two horn-like protrusions of cloth on both sides. During the 13th and 14th centuries this cloth was stiffened and the hat was rotated 90 degrees, effecting the front and back beaks of the liturgical mitre. Today special rules govern the wearing of the mitre during the liturgy. In general, it is removed whenever the bishop leads common prayer or any enactment of the sacraments.

I. Surplice. The Latin name of the surplice, superpelliceus ("over fur pelts"), belies its origin in the 11th century as a choir vestment that was worn over a fur-lined cassock. This white linen garment originally had the shape of a conical chasuble fashioned with short, wide sleeves. Gradually the surplice was shortened, squared at the shoulders and sometimes highly decorated with lace. Today, worn over a cassock, it is allowed to substitute for the alb, except when a chasuble or dalmatic is called for, or when one wears the stole to replace the chasuble or dalmatic.

J. Cassock. The cassock derives from a garment of barbarian origin called the caracalla. The emperor who introduced its use into Roman society was also given its name, "Caracalla" (211-217). Originally a sleeved tunic that opened in front and reached to the knees, the emperor donned a longer version, one that covered the ankles. From the 5th century onward the caracalla in both lengths became popular among monks and clerics, producing a great variety of religious habits and cassocks. The English name "cassock" is thought possibly to result through medieval Italian (casacca) and French (casaque) from a corruption of "caracalla." Itself not properly a part of the liturgy, the cassock is often worn under (subtanea=soutaine) true liturgical vestments. Normally black, its color can vary. The papal cassock is white; those of cardinals, scarlet; while archbishops, bishops and other prelates wear purple.

II. Liturgical Colors

A. Original White. From ancient times, originating from Egyptian and Mesopotamian sun worship, the wearing of white has traditionally been associated with light and divine life. Thus, priestly Israel wore white, along with other bright colors, to symbolize the "glory" of God (Leviticus 16). The Romans, especially on birthdays (dies candidatus), also wore white garments to express their aspirations to moral purity and their desire for unending life with the gods.

The NT as well associates white with divinity, linking it to Christ's work of redemption; e.g., in the accounts of the transfiguration, the apparitions of angels, and the redeemed whose clothes are washed white in the blood of the Lamb (Rev 7:14). Probably as early as the 2nd century (Farrell, 90-93), and certainly by the 4th century, baptism included a vesting in white clothing to signify the baptized's share in the glory of Christ. The white robe signaled a return in baptism through Christ's resurrection to the original body-soul integrity of paradise, a passage from sinful nakedness to that nudity which existed before the fall in which the whole person was completely ordered to God and "clothed" in his grace. For early Christians such unsoiled, white garments also signified high virtue and doctrinal purity.

B. Other Colors. In Tertullian's time (ca. 150-220) popular culture ascribed various colors to each of the seasons: white to the snows of winter, red to the summer's sun, green to the fertility of spring, and blue to darker autumn skies. In addition, just as light colors signified happiness, dark clothes connoted sadness and mourning. Black was identified with death probably because in the ancient near-East showing proper grief at funerals included rolling on the ground, so that one's clothes became soiled and dark. In fact, early church writers severely criticized Christians for their lack of faith if, during periods of mourning, they wore the traditional black instead of the white of Christ's resurrection. Furthermore, since red is the color of blood, in the ancient world it too was associated with death.

Until the 9th century clothing dyes were rare and expensive in the Roman world. The colorfast purple procured from the rare murex shellfish signified wealth and importance, so that the darker the color and the more extensive its use, the more noble the person (e.g., Lk 16:19). When a broader spectrum of colors became available, individual churches assigned different colors to each of the feasts and seasons. Blue, yellow, silver and gold were among those included. Pope Innocent III (1198-1216) was the first to set down a canon of liturgical colors for the local church at Rome (P.L. 217:799-802). He used only four colors: white for feasts of the Lord and the saints; red for Pentecost, for feasts of the cross, the apostles and martyrs; black for mourning and seasons of repentance (Advent and Lent); and green for days without special feasts. Purple was allowed to substitute for black on Holy Innocents and Laetare Sunday.

When Trent renovated the liturgy and standardized it for the whole Latin church, Innocent's canon was adopted with some modifications. It is this canon that is still used by the Roman rite today: white for feasts of the Lord, the Blessed Virgin, non-martyr saints, John the Baptist (June 24), John the Evangelist (Dec. 27), Chair of St. Peter (Feb. 22), Conversion of St. Paul (Jan. 25) [in the U.S. also as an option for offices and Masses for the dead]; red for Passion (Palm) Sunday, Good Friday, Pentecost, feasts of Apostles, Evangelists and martyrs; green for ordinary time; purple for Lent and Advent, an option for Masses for the dead; black an option for Masses for the dead; and rose for the 3rd Sunday of Advent ("Gaudete") and the 4th Sunday of Lent ("Laetare"). "On solemn occasions more precious vestments may be used, even if not of the color of the day" (G.I.R.M., 309).

Since 1864 blue vestments have been permitted in Spain and in its former dominions on the feast of the Immaculate Conception. Likewise, Vatican II's reforms allow local episcopal conferences in principle to adapt liturgical colors to the traditions of their national cultures. Thus, in the United States white is now an option for offices and Masses for the dead. However, after review in 1988 by the N.C.C.B., simple blue, whether light or dark, remains outside the sequence of liturgical colors in the United States. Rather, in order to differentiate the seasons and their meanings, the bluer violet tone of purple is suggested for Advent and the redder, more authentically purple for "the specifically penitential season of Lent."

C. Symbolism. "Variety in the color of the vestments is meant to give effective, outward expression to the specific character of the mysteries of the faith being celebrated and, in the course of the year, to a sense of progress in the Christian life" (G.I.R.M., 307). Just as white symbolizes the presence of the resurrected Lord in the church and his saints, the other colors radiate the various modes of his presence throughout the year. Thus red reflects the burning intensity of Christ's love in his death on the cross, in the blood shed by his martyrs, and in the fire of the Spirit poured out on the whole body of Christ. The darker, more somber color of purple connotes both the church's share in the kingship of Christ (Jn 19:1) and how it was realized through the suffering and death caused by our sins. Finally, green recalls how the same Christ through whom the outer green world was created (Col 1:16) is also the source of the church's inner life and growth throughout the year.

The wearing of colors, shades or combinations other than those in the liturgical canon solely on the basis of aesthetics, and without concern for traditional symbolism, makes the liturgy itself more ambiguous and lessens its power to communicate Christ in the saving events of his life, death and resurrection.

III. Theological Meaning

From ancient times the wearing of beautifully draped clothes has been a sign of civilization and of the human being's place in an ordered world. By their arrangement they evidence self-possession and self-mastery. Anthropologists isolate five possible reasons why humans began to wear clothing. In various cultures, besides the practical interests of protecting against weather and injury and covering nakedness, clothes can also signify a person's place or importance in society, enhance sexuality and augment personal mystery or magical powers. Simply put, clothing extends the natural symbolism of the body by bringing the person into a fuller, more articulated existence in the world.

According to the Bible, "the body, before the fall, existed in a wholly other way for the human being because the human being existed in a totally other way for God" (Peterson, 8). In rebelling against God's sovereignty, Adam and Eve rejected their true "clothing," their fundamental orientation to God and his love. God continued his care for them, fashioning temporary clothes out of skins to cover their shame (Gen 3:21). Indeed, the ancient wearing of sackcloth and ashes was no more than a recognition of this human insufficiency and need for God. For only in Christ does God truly clothe the human race, transforming by his grace, removing the shame of sinful human nature that is experienced in physical nakedness. In his taking on our humanity, the flesh of Adam, Christ is humiliated on the cross, stripped of his garments, so that creation itself is moved to cover him with darkness. With the resurrection on Easter morning he no longer needs mere human clothing. His bodily wrappings appear deliberately folded and laid aside in the tomb (Jn 20:7). In his glorified humanity, Christ, the "first-born of the dead" (Col 1:18), is fully transformed and clothed in the glory of God's love. Therefore, just as he put on and transformed our humanity, we humans, in order to be true to ourselves, must "put on Christ" (e.g., Rom 13:12-14), that is, live our lives "in Christ, . . . a new creation" (2 Cor 5:17).

A. Special Vestments. For Christians, then, all clothing, especially liturgical clothing, is meant to express the church's life in Christ. In Revelation the church is depicted as the bride of Christ who "has been given a dress to wear made of finest linen, brilliant white" (19:7), a garment which symbolizes both redemption in the blood of the Lamb and the holy works that flow from this new life (2:2-5). Thus, the white worn by the newly baptized, by brides in Christian weddings and by liturgical ministers, is all meant to signify the church's common life in Christ.

At the same time, the NT also speaks of the church as a "people of God" (Heb 4:9). This image recalls that each Christian has a unique calling and dignity in Christ's body, and that the Church itself is a communion of love among free individuals (1 Cor 12:4-11). Thus, at the liturgy not all are dressed in identical clothes. The calling of the ordained to be personal symbols of the one Christ who dwells in the hearts of all Christians is expressed in their individual liturgical vestments. The unique vestment of the single presider is thus both a reminder to the church of each Christian's uniqueness in Christ and of the one Lord who is common to all. The physically enveloping chasuble, especially in the colors of the season, allows the rest of the church to see in the presider, not primarily a single individual, but its own single voice in Christ, proclaiming the faith and praising the Father. Truly precious vestments worn by liturgical ministers announce that the liturgy is the summit of Christian life (S.C., 10) and remind all the baptized of their dignity as part of a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people set apart (1 Pet 2:9).

"The beauty of the vestment should derive from its material and design rather than from lavish ornamentation" (G.I.R.M., 306). Indeed, this royal, festive dimension of liturgical vestments is achieved primarily by the use of natural, noble materials: e.g., linen, silk, wool. Although often dictated by cost, polyester vestments, no matter how beautifully designed, do not drape or flow with movement nearly as beautifully and therefore lack the festive ability to symbolize the excess of God's love for humanity demanded by a true Christian celebration.

Furthermore, the level of festivity of a celebration corresponds to the rank and the meaning of the occasion. Consequently, it is essential to the liturgy as stylized Christian life that on more festive occasions, such as Sundays and major feast days, all liturgical ministers, including acolytes, readers and eucharistic ministers, be fully vested in their proper liturgical attire.

B. Ordinary Clothes. Finally, the fact that other members of the assembly do not wear stylized vestments acts as an important complement within the liturgy's symbolism. For the liturgy as an action is not removed from the world, but is rather the high point of all human life in this world. Therefore, by their wearing contemporary clothes, indeed their "Sunday best," the laity witness to the historicity of the church, to its necessary incarnation in every age. Dressed like those at the Passover meal prepared for the journey (Exod 12:11), the congregation embodies and expresses the church itself, ready to be sent into the world to gather all into that heavenly banquet of which the liturgy is but a pledge and foretaste on earth.

E. Haulotte, Symbolique du vêtement selon la hihle (Paris: Aubier, 1966). H. Norris, Church Vestments: Their Origin and Development (New York: E.P. Dutton, 1950). E. Peterson, Pour une théologie du vêtement, trans. by Y. Congar (Lyon: Éditions de l'Abécille, 1943). [Orig.: "Theologie des Kleides," Benediktinische Monatsschrift 16 (1934), 347-356]. R. Berger, "Liturgische Gewänder und Insignien," 309-346 in: Gottesdienst der Kirche: Handbuch der Liturgiewissenschaft: Teil 3, eds. H.B. Meyer et al. (Regensburg: F. Pustet, 1987). J. Farrell, "The Garment of Immortality: A Concept and Symbol in Christian Baptism" (Dissertation: Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., 1974). E. Sutfin, "The Chasuble in the Roman Rite," Liturgical Arts 24 (1956): 76-104.

JOHN D. LAURANCE, S.J.

VIATICUM

The post-Vatican II church has taken giant strides toward restoring the original tradition of anointing as a sacrament of the sick: no longer "extreme unction" or

"last rites," but a sacrament for those seriously impaired by sickness or old age. At the same time, however, we need to be careful not to neglect another revered tradition of the church, namely, its sacramental ministry to the dying which finds its centerpiece in the eucharist received as viaticum. Indeed, the full title of the revised ritual is Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (I.C.E.L., 1982); Part I has to do with "Pastoral Care of the Sick"; Part II is entitled "Pastoral Care of the Dying." Viaticum is described with these words: "The celebration of the eucharist as viaticum, food for the passage through death to eternal life, is the sacrament proper to the dying Christian. It is the completion and crown of the Christian life on this earth, signifying that the Christian follows the Lord to eternal glory and the banquet of the heavenly kingdom" (175).

The Tradition

"Viaticum" means quite literally "food for the journey." In Greek and Latin antiquity the custom prevailed of providing a meal for people undertaking a journey, as evidenced by the Latin viaticus (of or pertaining to a journey) or the Greek ephodion (provisions for a journey). Viaticum usually referred to the practice of providing the fare for the voyage after life: the obolus or coin placed in the mouth of the deceased to pay the ferryman Charon for passage across the river Styx.

In ecclesiastical language viaticum eventually came to have the specific meaning of the eucharist administered to a dying Christian. So great was the church's insistence that dying Christians be communicated that the first ecumenical Council of Nicaea in 325 condemned a rigorism which would exclude public penitents from the reception of viaticum. In canon 13 the council decreed that "the ancient and canonical ruling is to be observed" that a dying Christian "is not to be deprived of the last and necessary provision for the journey, viaticum." This canonical prescription about the importance of viaticum continues in the new Code of Canon Law of 1983 (can. 921, 922).

Viaticum is thus a striking instance of liturgical inculturation on the part of Christian antiquity. But there are also marked dissimilarities from the pagan rites. Pagans gave "viaticum" to those already dead, placing the coin in the mouth of the deceased; Christian viaticum like all sacraments is for the living. Pagans provided the dead with an inanimate coin as viaticum; Christians provided the living with life itself, the sacrament of the Lord's body and blood. And finally, Christian viaticum was not intended to pay for the journey of the soul to the place of eternal rest, but was rather a provision for passage to eternity, being itself a pledge of eternal life.

The oldest surviving Western liturgical sources for the ministry to the dying are found in Phillips 1667, a transcription of an 8th-century Gelasian sacramentary, and in Ordo Romanus 49. In the Phillips sacramentary communion by viaticum takes place after the reading of the passion according to John's gospel and other prayers, perhaps a witness to the primitive practice of dying with communion on the tongue. The dying Christian is accordingly prepared for death from both the table of the word and the table of the eucharist. On the other hand, Ordo 49 from 8th century Rome reverses the order and lists first the communion of the dying and then the reading of the passion as the Christian departs from this life. The striking rubric reads: "As soon as you see death approaching, he is to be communicated from the holy sacrifice, even if he communicated the same day, because communion will be his defender and helper. For it will raise him up."

Until the 12th century, communion was administered under both elements, often with the bread intincted with the wine. There were three manners of ministration: the dying person could be brought to church, Mass could be celebrated at home, or —the most common usage —the reserved sacrament could be brought from church for communion at home. In the Rituale Romanum of 1614 viaticum was considered under Title V on the eucharist as communion of the sick. Title IV devoted to the sick and the dying made no mention of viaticum except for an isolated rubrical suggestion for helping the dying: following viaticum and anointing was the commendation of the soul. Not only did the arrangement misrepresent the original sequence of the continuous rites with extreme unction following viaticum, it also confused the purpose of viaticum with communion for the sick by including it within the same service. This impropriety has been rectified by paragraph 74 of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy: "In addition to the separate rites for the anointing of the sick and for viaticum, a continuous rite shall be prepared in which a sick person is anointed after confession and before viaticum."

Liturgical Revision

The pastoral notes suggest that when anointing of the sick is celebrated at the beginning of a serious illness, viaticum celebrated when death is near will be more clearly perceived as the last sacrament of the Christian life. Priests and other ministers should do everything they can to ensure that those in proximate danger of death receive viaticum.

The revised ritual presents two formats: viaticum within Mass, considered the normative celebration, and viaticum outside of Mass, when particular circumstances render a full eucharistic celebration impossible. In either case, as far as possible, the celebration should be a communal one involving the participation of family and friends with appropriate readings, prayers, and even song. Some of the distinctive features of the rite of viaticum are the renewal of baptismal promises, the exchange of the sign of peace, the eucharist administered with special words proper to viaticum, and communion under both kinds.

The baptismal profession of faith takes place after the homily: the Christian preparing for the consummation of the paschal mystery uses the words of the original baptismal commitment which hopefully has been renewed many times at Easter. The sign of peace is shared with a genuine sense of leave-taking brightened by the joy of Christmas hope. The special words for reception capture the meaning of the eucharist received as a pledge of resurrection and nourishment for the passage through death: "May the Lord protect you and lead you to eternal life." Whenever possible, the dying Christian is to be communicated under both kinds; sometimes reception under the form of wine alone may be the only recourse. In addition to all of the above, special texts are provided for the general intercessions and final solemn blessing, and an opening instruction or address in the case of viaticum outside of Mass. The Apostolic Pardon is now part of the concluding rites of viaticum within Mass; for viaticum outside Mass the Apostolic Pardon follows the penitential rite.

All these provisions underscore the importance of administering viaticum at a time when the dying Christian can more consciously enter into the celebration. In order to avoid a sense of fatalism, the pastoral notes wisely suggest that when a Christian communicated with viaticum continues to linger on for some time, "he or she should be given the opportunity to receive the eucharist as viaticum on successive days, frequently if not daily" (par. 183). This prescription is reiterated in the new Code of Canon Law (can. 921.3).

See Sick, pastoral care of the; Death, ministry at the time of

Pastoral Care of the Sick: Rites of Anointing and Viaticum (Washington, D.C., I.C.E.L., 1982). Charles W. Gusmer, And You Visited Me: Sacramental Ministry to the Sick and the Dying, rev. ed. (New York: Pueblo, 1989).

CHARLES W. GUSMER

W

WEDDINGS, MUSIC AT

The role of music at weddings has changed considerably since Vatican II. In the past, music was performed mostly by the organist and the soloist/choir. It usually consisted of a processional, recessional, and several musical selections interspersed throughout the liturgy. Participation by the assembly was not practiced.

In light of the reform, music has a significant place in liturgy, including weddings. The goal of all liturgy is the full and active participation of the faithful, and music allows people to participate in a unique way.

The American bishops' statement on music, Music in Catholic Worship, notes the importance of music at liturgies: "Among the many signs and symbols used by the church to celebrate its faith, music is of pre-eminent importance. As sacred song united to the words it forms an integral part of the solemn liturgy. Yet the function of music is ministerial; it must serve and never dominate. Music should assist the assembled believers to express and share the gift of faith that is within them and to nourish and strengthen their interior commitment of faith. It should heighten the texts so that they speak more fully and more effectively. The quality of joy and enthusiasm which music adds to community worship cannot be gained in any other way. It imparts a sense of unity to the gathered assembly and sets the appropriate tone for a particular celebration. Music, in addition to expressing texts, can also unveil a dimension of meaning and feeling, a communication of ideas and intuitions which words alone cannot yield. This dimension is integral to the human personality and to our growth in faith" (23-24).

This statement provides a foundation for the role of music for weddings. The entire assembly, that is, the invited guests as well as the bride, groom and other members of the wedding party, is the celebrator of the liturgy. Musical selections should assist the assembly in expressing and sharing its faith within the wedding liturgy.

Music that is familiar and uncomplicated will best implement the participation of those gathered. The hymnal in the pew is usually a good starting place for choosing accessible music. Appropriate texts are those which include praise and thanksgiving to God for the love bestowed upon the people, this occasion, and on this couple. Love songs which do not include God's love are more acceptable at the wedding reception than during the liturgy. Popular music of the day may be considered if it fulfills these requirements.

Primary areas of consideration for assembly singing are: gospel acclamation; "Holy, holy, holy"; memorial acclamation; great Amen; communion and the responsorial psalm. Secondary places for song are: gathering, preparation of gifts, Lord's Prayer, Lamb of God, and closing. The use of the psalms is always encouraged and the Rite of Marriage recommends verses from the following psalms for the responsorial: Psalms 33, 34, 103, 112, 128, 145, 148. A sung response is the most appropriate. These psalms may also be used at other times throughout the liturgy when music is called for.

Instrumental music may also effectively complement the sung music and help unveil a level of meaning and emotion that words cannot express. The choices of instrumental music will determine the tone of the particular moment of the celebration. Instrumental music can be effective: during the seating of the guests; as a processional; during the preparation of the gifts (instead of sung music); after the communion song; as a recessional. The parish musician is the best resource for instrumental music.

The primary purpose of the solo voice at weddings as with other liturgical celebrations is to serve the liturgy. The primary role of the soloist is to lead the assembly in song. Only soloists who are capable of leading an assembly should be asked to do so. When solo or choir "performances" must take place they are best relegated to the same places as instrumental music in the liturgy. The responsorial psalm, however, can provide ample opportunity for musical expression.

A wedding is an opportunity for an engaged couple either to begin a relationship with a parish community and/or certainly an occasion to deepen that relationship with a parish community.

Enforcement of wedding policy must take place within this context with sufficient catechesis and pastoral care.

The use of the "traditional" Wedding March from Wagner's opera, Lohengrin (more commonly known as "Here comes the Bride"), and the "traditional" wedding processional from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream are rapidly declining in popularity. Apparent successors to this tradition are the processional used at the wedding of Prince Charles—the Trumpet Voluntary attributed to Jeremiah Clarke, and for recessional the Trumpet Tune of Henry Purcell.

The performance of the Ave Maria is best suited to the seating of the mothers of the bridal couple as a prelude or otherwise should be eliminated.

Mary Ann Simco, ed., Handbook of Church Music for Weddings, rev. ed. (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1985). Paul Covino, ed., Celebrating Marriage, Preparing the Wedding Liturgy: A Workbook for Engaged Couples (Washington, D.C.: The Pastoral Press, 1987). Music in Catholic Worship (U.S.C.C., 1972).

ELAINE J. RENDLER

WESTERN CHURCHES

See Traditions, liturgical, in the West; pre-Reformation; Eucharist, history of, in the West; Reformation churches

WOMEN IN MINISTRY

See Ministry, women in

WOMEN, ORDINATION OF

See Ordination of women

WORD AND SACRAMENT

Contemporary discussions regarding the relationship of word and sacrament are grounded in a biblical theology which considers God's word to be more than mere external utterance or intellectual discourse. It is, rather, the efficacious self-communication of God to creation. For God, to speak is to do. The word of God is an event of encounter. In Jesus Christ the word is incarnate. This incarnation continues through history in the church where the word continues to be preached and "made flesh" in the celebration of the sacraments. The early church clearly experienced and understood the complementarity of word and symbol. For theologians such as Augustine it was precisely the mutually enlightening relationship of word and sign which comprised the reality of sacrament as a visible word (In Johannem 80, 3).

The fracturing of the church's understanding and experience of these realities was largely rooted in a loss of the Jewish sense of the word as event. When the proclamation of the word became focused upon the communication and maintenance of intellectual truth, preaching became more an act of polemical theology and less a revelation of how the scriptural narrative proclaimed in the liturgy is God's story happening today in the life of the worshipping community. In this context preaching declined and the proclamation of the word was reduced to a non-essential prelude to sacramental celebration, while the celebration of the word was for all practical purposes reduced to the minister's pronouncement of the sacramental form deemed necessary for the valid celebration of the sacrament. The 16th-century Reformers reacted to this imbalance and opened a debate extending from their time until the Second Vatican Council. This polemic tended to categorize Protestantism as "the church of the word" in a negative state of tension with Roman Catholicism as "the church of the sacrament." The 19th-century revival of biblical and patristic studies led, however, to a theological revival in which the new context of liturgical and ecumenical movements encouraged Protestants and Catholics alike to move beyond their polemical medieval and Reformation positions to a renewed understanding of the relationship between word and sacrament.

In this century various Roman Catholic theologians (Grasso, Rahner, Semmelroth) have attempted to deal with a renewed understanding of God's efficacious word in a way which would not seem to contradict Trent's insistence upon the ex opere operato efficacy of the sacraments. Some proposed that the word apart from the sacrament works ex opere operantis while the word within the sacramental celebration works ex opere operato. K. Rahner posed the question in terms of revived biblical studies which communicate the scriptural understanding of the word of God as a saving event rendering present the grace of God which it announces. How then does word differ from sacrament? Rahner posits the word of God as an analogous concept, a reality taking place in the church in varying degrees of concentration and intensity. The supreme and most intensive realization of the word of God is precisely the sacramental word.

Rahner develops his position from the nature of the church as the primary sacrament, the historically visible and audible proclamation of Christ's victory and the actual presentation of that victory in the world. The fullest actualization of this reality occurs in the sacraments, especially within the eucharist, when the church, depending upon the free decree of Christ, addresses God's word to human beings in decisive situations of human salvation. All other acts of the church are ordered to the sacraments and all the sacraments to the eucharist where Christ is present by the power of his own word. Here Rahner develops the idea that the word is not the form of the sacrament simply within the celebration of the eucharist, but the word is permanently constitutive of the sacrament. The elements (matter) always refer back to the word whose power brings about Christ's abiding presence.

The theological development of these concepts rooted in the renewed study of scripture and patristics, ecclesiology and sacraments, ecumenism and the liturgy bore fruit in and took a major step forward in the teachings of the Second Vatican Council. S.C.'s expressed desire for a more lavish opening up of the Bible (51) and a renewal of preaching (52) gave new impetus to attempts at restoring the mutuality of word and sacrament. This is echoed and fostered in D.V., chap. VI, and is seen most concretely in the Lectionary for Mass (1969) and in the fact that every liturgical revision issuing from the council includes the proclamation of the word of God as an integral element.

The pastoral application of this renewed vision of word and sacrament is evidenced not only in ongoing calls for a renaissance of liturgical preaching but also in consistent efforts to open up the sacramental symbols. This has been a thoroughly ecumenical enterprise in which both traditional Catholic and Protestant theology have been enriched by the insights of contemporary studies of human communication in language and symbol. There is hardly a single Christian church which would today admit to an opposition between word and sacrament. These are no longer considered independent and different manners of divine self-communication but complementary realities incapable of accomplishing their task without reciprocal penetration. Every sacrament communicates the divine life by means of the word which is a direct address to the human person. The totality of the human person is touched by the word incarnated in sacramental signs.

See Word, theology of; Sacraments

Domenico Grasso, Proclaiming God's Message: A Study in the Theology of Preaching (Notre Dame, IN: Univ. of Notre Dame Press, 1965). David Power, Unsearchable Riches. The Symbolic Nature of Liturgy (New York: Pueblo, 1984). Karl Rahner, "The Word and the Eucharist," Theological Investigations, Vol. IV (Baltimore: Helicon, 1966): 253-286. Karl Rahner, "What is a Sacrament," Worship 47 (1973): 274-284.

ANDREW D. CIFERNI, O. PRAEM.

WORD, LITURGY OF THE

The liturgy of the word is that part of the eucharist beginning with the first reading and ending with the general intercessions. This same ritual action may be celebrated as a separate service (S.C., 35.4), in which case a blessing and dismissal usually follows the general intercessions.

The liturgy of the word is more than a bare recitation of the scriptures in the midst of the assembly. Christians do not simply recite God's word in a public setting. They proclaim and celebrate God's story and theirs in ritual gesture, song, silence and symbol. This tradition is an integral and constitutive part of our heritage from Israel. Early Christian liturgical sources bear witness to the importance of the proclamation of the word in the Christian assembly. In this proclamation the community's myth-mystery is experienced as a present reality. The present shape of the liturgy of the word within the reformed rites of Roman Catholicism is in radical continuity with the church's tradition (cf. Justin, Apologia I, 65, 67, 3-5), while exhibiting every sign of a renewed appreciation for the formative power of the scriptures, preaching and the active liturgical celebration of God's word (S.C., 24, 51-53).

The celebration of the liturgy of the word (within the eucharist or as an independent service) in the Roman rite is preceded by an introductory rite which, though not an essential or integral part of the liturgy of the word, is intended, to prepare the assembly to hear God's word and respond to that proclamation both within the liturgy of the word itself and at the eucharistic table liturgy which may follow it.

Ministries

Christ is present to his people in the very act of their assembling. The same Christ is present to his people in the proclamation of God's word (S.C., 7). The entire assembly, of which every liturgical minister is a member, has the primary ministry of listening attentively to the word proclaimed and responding actively and consciously to what has been heard in word, silence, song and gesture. The interplay of proclamation and response symbolizes the divine economy in which God's initiative is always a call asking for the hearer's faith-filled response. The church's continually deepening sense of her call to hear and respond to God's word in the liturgical assembly is underlined in the second edition of the Introduction to the Lectionary (I.L., 81) which presents a more expanded exposition of this topic.

The lectors (readers) proclaim as the living word of God the scriptural texts other than the gospel. The deacon, presider or some other priest (a concelebrant and/or homilist other than the presiding priest) proclaims the gospel. The homilist interprets the word that it might be experienced as the ongoing story of God happening today in this assembly's life. Leaders of song, cantors, schola (choir) members and instrumentalists enable the assembly's response in psalmody, in the greeting of the gospel and in intercessory prayer.

Textual and Other Verbal Elements

Sundays, solemnities, feasts of the Lord which fall on Sundays in ordinary time and some special celebrations, e.g., Ash Wednesday, are marked by the normative proclamation of three readings: the first (from the OT or the NT other than one of the gospels) is always followed by the responsorial psalm; the second (from the NT other than one of the gospels) and the third (always from one of the four gospels) which is preceded by the gospel acclamation and followed by the homily, profession of faith (on Sundays and solemnities) and general intercessions.

On other feasts, memorials and weekdays (whether in ordinary time or within the liturgical seasons) there are two readings: the first from the OT or NT but never from the gospels and the second which is always from one of the four gospels. Though the Introduction to the Lectionary (I.L., 81, 78-88) and the Directory for Masses with Children (D.M.C., 42) give broad allowance for pastoral adaptation in the choice and omission of readings, the gospel reading may never be omitted in the celebration of the eucharist. The Roman rite makes no provision for the proclamation of nonscriptural readings within the eucharistic liturgy of the word.

Since the liturgical reforms of the Second Vatican Council, the homily is seen to be an integral part of the liturgy of the word. The G.I.R.M. 41 specifies that it may be based not only upon the scriptures proclaimed but also upon any of the liturgical texts and upon the mystery being celebrated. This distinguishes the homily from the sermon which is a religious but not a strictly liturgical form of oratory and which may have no relation to the readings or other liturgical elements of the celebration in which it is delivered.

The Nicene Creed is the text almost always employed for the profession of faith on Sundays and solemnities. The D.M.C. 49 allows for the use of the Apostles' Creed. At all Easter Masses the profession of faith is made within the renewal of baptismal vows. In that setting a more ancient primitive question-response form is employed.

General intercessions have been restored within the Roman liturgy of the word as part of the liturgical reform instituted by the Second Vatican Council. This liturgical prayer form is expressive of the logic of biblical prayer, i.e., the proclamation of God's story is an act of anamnesis which inspires renewed confidence from which the assembly brings its needs before God. These prayers are introduced by the presider's invitation. The petitions are sung or recited by the deacon, a lector or the leader of song. The entire assembly responds with a short sung or recited call upon God's mercy. The presider concludes with a prayer addressed to God. The order of the general intercessions within the liturgy of the word is modified by the celebration of some of the rites of the R.C.I.A.

In every art form voids are as integral as solids. Silence is as integral to the liturgy of the word as rests are to music for the word issues forth from silence and the prayer which rises to God in the silence is as much response as sung psalmody and acclamation. Brief periods of silence are most appropriate after the reading(s) and psalm which precede the gospel, after the homily and after the final petition of the general intercessions.

The Book(s)

The lectionary contains all the readings selected for the celebration of the eucharist according to the order of the calendar for the liturgical year. Readings for the celebration of some other rites are also contained in this liturgical book. The I.L.M. 81.17 and the G.I.R.M. 84 and 131 also make provision for a gospel book (evangelary) which may be carried in the entrance procession and placed on the altar until the gospel acclamation when the deacon or the priest who will proclaim the gospel brings it to the ambo.

The lectionary (and, where employed, the evangelary) are primary ritual objects within the celebration of the liturgy of the word. Every care and attention is to be devoted to their visual presentation and their ritual treatment. Missalettes or other printed forms of the readings detract from the dialogic nature of the liturgical act and weaken the symbolic role of the lectionary.

Musical Elements

Though all of the readings may be chanted, this is rarely done except for the gospel in very solemn celebrations. The I.L.M. 81.17-18 indicates that the concluding salutation of each reading may be sung even when the reading has been recited. The most essentially musical element in the liturgy of the word is the gospel acclamation which may be omitted if it is not sung (G.I.R.M., 39). This acclamation, though it follows the second reading (Sundays and solemnities), is the assembly's joyful song of praise to welcome Christ in the proclamation of the gospel narrative of the day. It is also the processional chant for the movement of the priest or deacon to the ambo.

The responsorial psalm is also a primary musical element in the rite. Its name derives from its normative mode of performance: an easily accessible sung response is first repeated by the assembly after it has been intoned by the leader of song and is sung again by all after every appointed verse of the psalm sung by the cantor and/or schola.

The profession of faith may be sung and this text is one of the chants recommended to be learned by all in Latin. Finally the general intercessions may be sung. This is entirely appropriate to the litanical nature of this text: the response to the petitions, sung or recited by the deacon, a lector or the leader of song, is made by the entire assembly.

Posture, Gesture and Movement

Posture is indicative and constitutive of prayer. The assembly is seated to hear the non-gospel readings and for the responsorial psalm and homily. All stand for the gospel acclamation, the proclamation of the gospel, the profession of faith and the general intercessions. The gospel procession holds the potential for the fullest bodily engagement. In this ritual element the gospel acclamation is sung, all stand and the one who will proclaim the gospel is led in procession to the ambo. This procession may include thurifer and acolytes carrying lit candles.

Environment

The normative arrangement of Roman Catholic worship spaces calls for one ambo (lectern, pulpit) whence the scriptures are proclaimed and the homily preached. From this privileged place of proclamation the Easter Exsultet, the responsorial psalm and the petitions of the general intercessions may also be sung. Other elements of liturgical leadership in the liturgy of the word, e.g., the gospel acclamation, and other liturgical elements requiring some sort of reading desk, such as concluding announcements, are done from a less significant and often portable lectern or stand. The homily is given from the ambo or the presidential chair. In the latter case the presider-homilist may sit or stand.

Sunday Worship in the Absence of a Priest

Celebrations of the liturgy of the word are most frequently experienced within the larger ritual action of the eucharist, the other sacraments, the L.O.H., the rites of initiation into religious life and the rites of burial. S.C. 35's suggested celebration of Bible services would seem to be met by the provision for the celebration of the office of vigils in the revised L.O.H. The contemporary crisis of priestless parishes presents the church with a pastoral situation in which non-ordained ministers may frequently be called upon to lead the Sunday assembly in liturgical prayer. In these cases, morning prayer, evening prayer or a liturgy of the word may be celebrated with or without the distribution of communion.

A shortage of ordained ministers can not keep the local assembly from responding to God's call to gather for worship on the Lord's Day. Even where the full eucharistic form of Sunday celebration is not possible, the word of God proclaimed and celebrated in the liturgy—even without the distribution of communion—is a baptismally grounded imperative. For in every liturgical celebration of the word in which the assembly strives to hear the scriptures with united heart and mind and to respond in unity of voice and action Christ is present and the face of the church is made manifest in the world.

Congregation for Divine Worship, Directory for Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest, Origins 18 (1988): 301-307. Lectionary for Mass: Introduction. Eng. trans. of the 2nd editio typica (1981) (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1982). R. Cabié, The Eucharist, vol. II of A.G. Martimort, ed., The Church at Prayer (Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, 1986).

ANDREW D. CIFERNI, O.PRAEM.

WORD, THEOLOGY OF THE

"Word of God" is a broad theological term that embraces all of God's self-revealing activity. It refers to the communication in human history of what is hidden in God, and is ultimately, therefore, the communication of the very person of God. God has spoken in many and diverse ways (Heb 1:1-2; D.V., 4), but God's word has come to be associated primarily with the person of Jesus, the sacred scriptures, and the preaching or proclamation of the church.

"Word of God" is a phrase that has been in the Christian tradition from the beginning and is accepted by all Christian confessions. The Protestant churches understand it primarily as the scriptural word, while the Roman Catholic church identifies the term more with the reality (the person of Jesus Christ) itself. As a theological term, i.e., one developed by the science of theology, "word of God" means what those who use it wish it to mean. Since thought is culturally conditioned, terms take on nuances which they may not previously have had, and thus they work differently in different theological systems. There is not therefore one monolithic meaning of "word of God" that has been handed on unchanged through the centuries.

The term is central to the whole theological endeavor. It has implications for all branches of theology. In fact, "word" is at the heart of Christian theology for it has to do with the offer of salvation which is addressed to human freedom, where men and women say "yes" or "no" in an act of faith that springs from the work of the Holy Spirit.

In spite of its centrality to the theological endeavor, however, "word of God" has only quite recently been given a notable place in Catholic theology. Some reasons for a more comprehensive understanding include: contemporary discussions of grace understood as the uncreated self-communication of God; renewed interest in the Greek Fathers with their emphasis on the incarnation as a moment of redemption; the felt need for a theology of preaching; the insights of biblical theology into the nature of the living, creative, penetrating word of God; and closer communication between Catholic and Protestant theologians which has resulted in a greater agreement that sacrament is as revelatory as is the word of God, and that the word itself achieves its highest point of fulfillment in the sacramental act.

These developments have not yet produced a coherent theology of the word. What follows here is an attempt to disclose some characteristics of the word which bring out its essence as word of God in and to the church. Two notions are particularly helpful in understanding the concept. One comes from a philosophical analysis of language and human speech and the other from the insights of biblical theology into the nature of the word.

Language and Human Speech

The concept of "word" raises questions about what words are in human life, and specifically for Christian theology, life

lived in the image of God. It is out of our own human experience that we posit speech in God. If we look at human experience and the way human beings arrive at self-knowledge, we see that we express a word to ourselves about who we are. Indeed, we must speak to become who we are; to find out who and what we are and what we are not. Although word is not merely something about a person, i.e., pure information for a practical purpose, it is this first. Beneath that, however, is the intention of the one speaking to communicate himself or herself. The real power of language is in the donation of self, the offer of self. To say "Good morning," for example, is not just information that the sun is up but an opening up to the person listening. Word, then, is not merely something about a person; it is, even more, self-expression and self-gift. The one who speaks ultimately gives his or her self to those who listen and receive. Word is free, personal self-disclosure. It is the basis of all friendship, including friendship with God.

This relationship between word and human existence sheds light on the function of "word of God" as it carries both communication about God and communication of God's own self. Knowledge may be communicated to others by concept or by metaphor. When concept is employed, knowledge remains somewhat informational and objective; concept communicates by analogy. When metaphor is employed, however, the knowledge communicated is more than informational; the person of the speaker is communicated as well. The language itself becomes invitational and mutually involving of both speaker and listener; it becomes doxological, the language of worship. Thus "word of God" refers to the self-disclosing, self-unveiling act of God. When applied in Christian discourse to Jesus Christ, it names Christ as the very self-expression of God, Jesus revealed as God's Son. In parallel with human communication, where word speaks both about the person and the very selfhood of the person. God's word conveys both knowledge about God and God's very self. God speaks to women and men whom God's love is seeking out. The aim of such speech is to involve the hearer in what is heard, and to call forth surrender of the hearer's life into God's love.

Biblical Studies

The second area that sheds light on our use of the term is biblical theology with its insights into the nature of the word. The tendency of Western thought to concentrate on the objective content of the word caused a certain distortion in Catholic theology in which word was restricted to matters of doctrine or to the word that spoke about something. Biblical theology has retrieved for us what scripture has to say about the living, effective, creative word of God. The biblical authors describe word as a saving power or force let loose in the world; as an event of salvation. "For the word of God is living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing to the division of soul and spirit, of joints and marrow, and discerning the thoughts and intentions of the heart" (Heb 4:12). "Finally, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may speed on and triumph, as it did among you" (2 Thess 3:1). "Let us go over to Bethlehem and see this word that has come to pass" (Luke 2:15).

The background for this understanding can be found in the Hebrew dahar (word), which means, not simply speech in the ordinary sense of "word," but a kind of deed, happening or event. Dahar is dynamic; it has meaning and power. More than the expression of thought, word is something operative and efficient. It is not just the speaker, but the word itself, that is active. Word goes forth as a reality in its own right, achieving the end for which it was sent (see Isa 55:10-11).

The dynamic power of the dahar Yahweh=word of God, is never far from the Hebrew mind. As the word proceeds from the mouth of God, it both reveals God's will and carries God's power. God's word is primarily a powerful act which creates the world (Gen 1:3; Ps 33:6,9; Ps 147:4, 15-18; Wis 9:1; Isa 48:13); gives the Torah (Deut 5:5; 8:3; 32:47; Exod 34:1,27-28; Ps 147:19); and directs history (Deut 4:20; Sir 44:1-50:24).

But in the Hebrew Scriptures, it is the word of the prophet that is most particularly word of God. The prophet is claimed by God's word and compelled to declare that word to the people. The prophetic word, charged with the power of God "to root up and to tear down, to build and to plant" (Jer 1:9-10), was at once instructive and transformative. Jeremiah describes it as a fire burning in his bones (20:7-9), or a hammer that splits rock (23:29), or again as a fire that devours people like wood (5:14). For Hosea it was Yahweh's means of slaying the people (6:5), and for Isaiah, a force that explodes like a bomb (9:8). These descriptions suggest that the prophetic word has a dynamism to bring into existence the reality of which it speaks.

These qualities of the word are carried forward into the NT where the Greek logos is employed in this dynamic Hebrew sense. In the gospels, word first refers to Jesus' message, his preaching and his teaching (Mk 2:2; 4:33; 8:32). The crowds are amazed at the power of Jesus' words which expel demons (Mt 8:16; Mk 1:25), effect bodily healing (Mt 8:8; Mk 7:34), and control nature (Mk 4:39). But his words also make salvation real; they bring about the kingdom. His words have the same power and authority as Yahweh's word; Luke, the theologian of the word, even equates Jesus' word with the word of God (Lk 5:1; 4:32; 8:11).

There is a discernible shift in the understanding of word from the preaching of Jesus to the preaching about Jesus, i.e., preaching which has as its content the person of Jesus. This is an important distinction: between Jesus' own preaching about God and about the kingdom at hand, and the church's preaching about Jesus when word becomes not simply word of God but word of the church as well. In the Lucan writings, particularly the Acts of the Apostles, word of God is a technical term for the gospel message understood as the whole Christ event, an event full of power (Acts 1:1; 15:7; Lk 1:2). Paul, too, uses word as a synonym for the Good News about Jesus and he emphasizes the dynamic character of the message. It is the saving power of God at work in the world (Rom 1:16; 1 Thess 1:4,6; 1 Cor 1:18). The word is revealed through his preaching, but Paul wants to make sure there is no mistake about the source of his power (2 Cor 4:7; 1 Cor 3:5-7; 1 Thess 2:13). It is the very word of God; the word of life (Phil 2:16); of reconciliation (2 Cor 5:19); of faith (Rom 10:8); of truth (2 Cor 6:7; Eph 1:13; Col 1:5, 2 Tm 2:15).

Finally, in the Johannine writings, the word is personalized in Jesus. Wherever he is, the Word of God is (Jn 1:1-2, 14). Jesus, in his person, his message, the Spirit that he brings, is the saving Word of God. Sent to reveal the inner life of God (D.V. 4), he speaks of what he has heard and seen (Jn 3:34; 8:37). All that God wants to say to us is said in the flesh of this man Jesus. He is the Word that is heard and seen and touched and handed on (1 Jn 1:1). Jesus the Word is truth (Jn 1:14) and life (Jn 1:4, 13); he reveals the glory of the Father (Jn 1:14).

Word As Event

All of this prepares the way for an understanding of God's word as an event in which the loving intention of God for humanity is revealed. God's word is creative and so we have to say it is sacramental, i.e., it is mediated or revealed in matter. It is also historical, i.e., we cannot know the word except in and through matter and in the experience of human history. God's word means God's activity first and foremost revealing God's self in, through and by way of finite reality. As God speaks in history, grace inspires and enables one to see through the historical event to its revelatory character: that this man on the cross, for example, is God's own Son achieving through his death God's salvation. In the speaking, God's unveiling of God's own self to be known and loved has to be interpreted in an act of faith so that ordinary realities, specifically the life and mission of Jesus, mediate salvation. The word spoken eternally in the depths of the Trinity is spoken temporally in our history.

There is a strong anthropological element inherent in the concept. Only human beings use words. The human being is constituted by language; the main feature of being is language. Theological anthropologists point out that the human being is marked precisely by the capacity to speak. The only place where language originates and exists is in the human. Without human speech God cannot say who God is because the mystery of God transcends all human experience. God has to assume human words for humans to experience and receive God's self-communication.

This indirect reference or requisitioning of human language is described in an apt phrase of Vatican II: "God reveals himself by revealing man (sic) to himself" (G.S., 41). If God is to speak to the human person, then God must speak in a language that can be understood. The self-communication of God is mediated in, through and by way of concrete, finite things. God's word is always mediated. In our reaching to God it is always a question of mediation. But this should not conceal the truth that in God's approach to us there is an immediacy at the core of mediation. From God's side there is such a thing as mediated immediacy.

The second person of the Trinity, in assuming human self-consciousness, had to subject himself to the process of human language. God desired to offer salvation to humanity through Jesus Christ. It is through Christ's human life and human language, continued now in the language which the church employs to convey the experience of salvation, that the offer is made.

The word of God, then, is no longer a disembodied Logos: Jesus is the incarnate Word. Scripture is embodied, and the proclamation by the church must make do with human sounds, images and experiences. We cannot know God's self-revelation if we bypass human experience. The word links us to God's activity but God's activity is bound to our human truth. In order for God to achieve this self-communication, God created in us a desire for the word, a propensity to hear. But on our part there has to be openness to what God reveals if there is not to be rejection.

Word As Revelation

Since word has a revealing function, it is most closely linked with revelation. The two terms are more similar than dissimilar, and are often used interchangeably. They are not, however, synonymous. Their connotations are different. Revelation evokes images of activity with the emphasis on God who speaks. Word evokes images of content, with emphasis on what is being said. In the end, however, they point to the same reality. Word contains meaning which is ultimately much more than information or knowledge about God; the meaning of word is God's own self freely and powerfully given. Revelation is much more than the act of God speaking; it is God's action of self-communication.

Vatican II stressed this personal and dynamic nature of revelation: "It pleased

God, in his (sic) goodness and wisdom, to reveal himself and to make known the mystery of his will (cf. 1 Ph 1:9). . . . By this revelation, then, the invisible God (cf. Col 1:15; 1 Tm 1:17), from the fullness of his love, addresses men (sic) as his friends (Exod 33:11; Jn 15:14-15), and moves among them (cf. Bar 3:38), in order to invite and receive them into his own company" (D.V., 2). The person and mystery of God as offering salvation, and not simply as offering ideas and truths about God, is the great truth which is communicated. The most important revelation is the very self-gift of God which is made and accomplished through the word. The word of God is itself the content of God's self-revelatory activity.

A theology of the word must include proclamation as well as revelation. That which is heard must be spoken in turn to others. The initiative in speaking belongs to God; it remains always "God's word." That word, however, is addressed to women and men, and those who respond to and accept God's word and who are formed by the word into the church are by that very fact commissioned and enabled to speak what they have heard. Not everyone will accept the word; it is directed to human freedom, and there must always be the possibility of refusal. God's word is addressed to all humans, both those who accept it and those who refuse or repudiate it. Those who do accept, however, are constituted as the church (word forms and constitutes the church) and as the church are charged in turn with the proclamation of what is heard and believed. And as it continues its mission of proclamation, the church continues to realize itself.

The primary response of the church to the word that is heard is gratitude and eucharist. Gratitude and eucharist, however, contain in themselves a desire to speak that word further to those who have not yet heard. Yet as word continues to be spoken, Christ himself remains the one who is spoken and the one who speaks: "He is present in his word, since it is he himself who speaks when the holy Scriptures are read in the Church" (S.C., 7).

When God speaks, there has to be someone who listens, who hears and who understands. God speaks, but speaks to someone. It is this which constitutes the body of believers who form the church. The reason why the church can proclaim the word is that it has itself heard it in faith, accepted it and been formed by it. The church continues to put in human words what God has communicated to the church in God's revelatory, inspirational act. Yet God continues not only to speak, but also to interpret what God speaks. The agent of interpretation remains God's Spirit placed in the human heart. "But the Counselor, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I have said to you" (Jn 14:26). The full meaning of the word, not just its human meaning, is given by God who sends the Spirit to enable believers to hear the word, understand the word and speak the word, and thus be the church of Jesus Christ.

All this happens in the realm of grace, God's gracious self-communication, which includes within itself the power to hear and respond. "The obedience of faith (Rom 16:26; cf. Rom 1:5; 2 Cor 10:5-6) must be given to God as he reveals himself.... Before this faith can be exercised, man must have the grace of God to move and assist him; he must have the interior helps of the Holy Spirit, who moves the heart and converts it to God, who opens the eyes of the mind and makes it easy for all to accept and believe the truth" (D.V., 5). The grace to respond, moreover, involves more than simple hearing; hearing the word means a commitment to it. And the commitment, in the realm of faith, is to proclaim that word further, and to continue to allow God to interpret that word so that God may "share with us divine benefits which entirely surpass the powers of the human mind to understand" (D.V., 6).

In other words, God's speaking, which includes God's acting, has to be interpreted for human life, but the act of interpretation itself remains God's work: interpretation by the human heart and mind is the work of the Holy Spirit. There is meaning in the word; the Holy Spirit enables the church to unearth it. It is thus grace that enables the church to grasp God's meaning. The Spirit who teaches all things (Jn 14:26) and who searches all things, even the depths of God (1 Cor 2:10), prompts us to lay hold of God's meaning.

Word In Contemporary Theology

In contemporary theology, dating from the work of Karl Barth, "word of God" has been used in three foundational senses: it is primarily the Incarnate Word; it is secondarily the articulation of that word in sacred scripture; and, it is thirdly the preaching or proclamation of the church. While these three forms of the word owe a great deal to Barth, they have been taken over by others including Karl Rahner.

The word of God in its primary sense refers to the Incarnate Word. Jesus of Nazareth, Logos incarnate, is the Word of God. The second Person in God is therefore God's Word. It is that word which becomes incarnate; not the Father who speaks the word nor the Holy Spirit who disperses the word and takes it to humanity forming the church. The second person of the Trinity precisely in his hypostatical, personal character as word is the one who becomes incarnate. Only the second person is word and revelatory in that sense. All that God means to say to us is said through him. He bears God's life and meaning for us. He is God's Word. "For he sent his Son, the eternal word who enlightens all men, to dwell among men and to tell them about the inner life of God. . . . He revealed that God was with us, to deliver us up to eternal life" (D.V., 4).

The word that happened in the incarnation determines all other words. When we say "Word of God," the primary reference is always to the second person of the Trinity.

A secondary meaning of "word of God" is the sacred scriptures themselves as bearing witness to that primary word. It is commonly accepted by Christians that the Bible is the locus of divine revelation and as such holds a unique position in the life and faith of the church (D.V., 21). Although the Bible itself takes for granted that scripture is the word of God and uses "God says" and "scripture says" interchangeably, scripture itself is not identical to God's word, i.e., it is not the word per se but the articulation of God's word in language. Nonetheless, the content of God's word has been brought to language in a normative way in the sacred scriptures, especially for Christians in the NT. It is done here in a normative way because the experience of those who wrote the NT is unique. What is experienced by the first followers of Jesus is his own preaching: "the time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent and believe in the gospel" (Mk 1:15). They share the conviction that God is now in Jesus offering salvation. Because it is normative, it is the point of reference for all other expressions of the "word of God."

Scripture has the character of human testimony and is marked with all the limitations of human utterance. This, however, is "without prejudice to God's truth and holiness" (D.V., 13). For the authority of scripture is the authority of God revealing; the writing is a continued incarnation. God's act here is a kenosis. "Hence, in sacred Scripture, without prejudice to God's truth and holiness, the marvellous 'condescension' of eternal wisdom is plain to be seen 'that we may come to know the ineffable loving kindness of God and see for ourselves how far he has gone in adapting his language with thoughtful concern for our nature' (St. John Chrysostom). Indeed the words of God, expressed in the words of men, are in every way like human language, just as the Word of the eternal Father, when he took on himself the flesh of human weakness, became like men (D.V., 13). It is for this reason that scripture, according to the Catholic view, not only contains but is the word of God.

Scripture is the full and faithful reflection of God's action in history. But to understand it as word of God, we have to approach it not as a mere report, as information, but as an invitation into dialogue with God in God's saving activity. "Word," then goes beyond the text and occurs in the consciousness of believers who read it as God's free offer of salvation. Read in faith and in the church, scripture is the saving word of God (S.C., 7).

Since the mediation of God to us in sacred scripture takes the form of narrative that is passed on from one generation to the next, there can be distortions. For the Protestant, private reading with the illumination of the Holy Spirit can gain the true meaning. For the Catholic, however, the Holy Spirit's authority is in the community and proper meaning is conveyed and judged by the corporate church. This interpretive understanding and handing on of what is in the gospel is called tradition. Tradition does not add anything new but interprets in the act of handing on.

The act of proclaiming the word in community is the word of the Lord. The church takes the place of Christ now ascended to the right hand of the Father and continues in time and place what the first believers experienced in Jesus. The church is really the word of God whose whole being proclaims the presence of Christ. Preaching prolongs the sending from the Father; once again the second person of the Trinity is offered. It is a bestowal of the life which the second person has in the Trinity, and it gives us a participation in that life. The proclamation of the word, the proclamation of this living word, the living Christ, speaking in his body. Now the Father's word is uttered in and through the church. So God's word is now spoken in human words which the church can hear and speak. It is God's word still but God's word spoken and incarnate in the church.

The announcement of the word of God is the efficacious proclamation which brings about the reality of which it speaks, the grace announced. It is a way in which the reality being proclaimed discloses itself. The word being spoken and then embraced by those who hear explains the efficacy of the word. At the moment the word takes place there is the offer of salvation. The proclamation is directed to believing ears and hearing in faith is acceptance of the grace offered. While preaching has a content (the life, death, and resurrection of Christ), it also has the character of present address. And the grace of God or the forgiveness of God or the love of God are not merely spoken about but occur as an event. For what is ultimately spoken and accepted is God as the one who confers salvation. Thus preaching is not a mere occasion for encounter with the word (Barth) but is itself a saving word. It renders Christ present in his saving power.

The goal of the proclamation of the word of God is always the total self-bestowal of God and the total acceptance of God's offer on the part of believers. The goal, however, is an eschatological goal; human life and human history must always unfold where that goal is only partially realized. Human expressions of the word of God can never present the fullness of God; the presence of God in word is not always the same in each of its expressions. At the same time, human acceptance of the word will always be done in degrees. Short of the eschaton, the full reality of God's efficacious word can be made present only in sacrament, where the sacraments of the church hold forth both the fullness of the word and its ever-partial human realization. Word and sacrament are not only not mutually exclusive, they are in fact complementary. Augustine's adage still holds: accedit verbum ad elementum et fit sacramentum (the word is spoken upon the human reality and it becomes a sacrament) (In Joann. Ev. tr. 80,3).

It is certainly an over-simplification to distinguish Roman Catholic and Protestant piety on the basis of a division between sacrament and word. But clearly the emphasis in Roman Catholic theology has fallen more markedly on sacrament while primary emphasis in Protestant theology has been given to word. Since the time of Vatican II, however, both have come to recover and treasure the richness of what each had neglected, and to recover as well the necessary link that exists between sacrament and word. Word that is spoken unveils and clarifies the meaning of the human sacramental act; the act itself gives living voice to the word that is spoken.

See Preaching...; Homily; Word, liturgy of the; Word and sacrament; Language, liturgical; Language and human experience; Evangelization; Catechumenate; Communication, ritual as; Hermeneutics and worship; Inclusive language

Bernard Cooke, Ministry to Word and Sacrament: History and Theology (Phila: Fortress, 1976). Frederick Crowe, Theology of the Christian Word (New York: Paulist, 1978). Jerome Murphy-O'Connor, Paul on Preaching (New York: Sheed and Ward, 1964). Karl Rahner, "The Word and the Eucharist" in Theological Investigations IV (1966): 253-86. Otto Semmelworth, The Preaching Word: On the Theology of Proclamation (New York: Herder & Herder, 1965). The Word: Readings in Theology, ed. by students at the Canisianum, Innsbruck (New York: P.J. Kenedy & Sons, 1964).

KATHLEEN CANNON, O.P.

WORSHIP

Worship is a universal phenomenon. It consists in a response of veneration in the face of the recognized presence of God.

God, as the object of worship is perceived as "Other"—transcendent, all-powerful, creator, benevolent Father. God is seen as "mysterious," i.e., partly-revealed to the worshipping subject and yet needing to be revealed further by some continuing or deepening encounter. The person who worships realizes that his/her response to God demands a total and whole-hearted commitment to faith in God and to a life in accord with God's "laws." The form that worship takes would, in the main, be words, music, bodily action, or silent contemplation. Its content would be expressed by means of adoration, reverence, sorrow for one's sinfulness, gratitude for past favors, petition for future gifts.

Worship may be private or even individualistic. However, and especially in a Christian context, it very often carries the overtone of an official and communally sanctioned activity: and in this sense, the Christian church's formal public worship of God in and through Christ is called "liturgy" (S.C., 5). It not only responds to God's recognized presence but it also seeks to enter into a relationship of communion with him through Christ (Rom 6:8-11).

Worship arises, generally, from remembering, anamnesis, that is, recounting of a specific intervention of God in human existence, or from an archetypal story of humankind in relation to God. The technical name for this basis of worship is myth, a profoundly true story which has validity independent of any particular historical circumstances.

For the Christian, the myth of salvation history, i.e., God's continuing presence in events prior to and within the life of Jesus, spills over and continues into our lives. It becomes for us both an exemplar to recognize his active presence now and a spur to respond ethically to that loving presence. Specific events in that history/myth provide occasions for our worship of God. The factual sequence of events that is the life, death, resurrection and glorification of Jesus the Christ lies at the heart of our worship of God. The "paschal mystery," which is the revelation and glorification of Jesus, is the culminating point of salvation history. Par excellence for Christians, worship of whatever nature is through, with and in Jesus Christ (see, doxology of eucharistic prayer).

Worship uses words or things that are seen as symbols, i.e., "presence-carriers," in that they either put us in touch with God through the meaning that is given to them, or they actually indicate for us the presence of God's love. For example, water used in baptism is symbolic and worthy of veneration because we believe that it puts us in touch with the dying and rising of Jesus Christ. We die to sin and we rise to a new and transformed life by association with him. Bread and wine used in eucharistic worship are carriers of the presence of Christ as the personal embodiment of God's love. Jesus Christ, the final and full expression of that love, is truly present for us in the symbols of bread and wine. Furthermore, Jesus' offering of his life to God the Father and to us was itself an act of worship. We become, through the symbol, participants in his act of worship.

An important dimension of worship is that it is repetitive or celebratory. It considers and reviews again and again God's love and goodness. Not only may a particular ritual be repeated but the worshippers may repeat the myth/story under various titles (e.g., baptism as giving life in Christ, eucharist as nourishing life in Christ, penance as restoring life in Christ, etc). Along with words, individual rites and bodily actions in worship will indicate the particular grounds on which we worship or celebrate God's love for us in Christ.

Another facet of worship as celebratory is that it remembers the past, while it considers the present, and looks toward the future. While we worship, we recall God's past favors, recognize his presence now, and reflect on how that presence and goodness speak to our current experience of life and to the way in which we will conduct our personal and communal lives in the future. By way of model and goal for their worship, Christians are encouraged to look to the scriptural picture painted for us of the worship offered at God's throne in heaven (Rev 4, 5, 7:9ff).

Celebratory worship tends to center around major events in human life: birth, membership in a community, nourishment, restoration of broken relationships, the recognition of our mortality, and so on. Most Christians would see their sacraments of baptism and eucharist as celebrations of coming to life in Christ and the nourishing or deepening of that life. These official actions of the church are, through Christ, actions of worship of the Father and of his love as it is found in the inception and growth of Christ's life in us. Catholic and Orthodox Christians go further to say that some key moments of an individual's life within the Christian community are also formal worship moments that call for official actions of the church. Thus all of the sacraments are part of our liturgical worship. We can recognize and encounter God's love in Christ in each of them, and we worship him as we perform them.

Christians envisage the life and worship of the church now as being under the guidance and direction of God's Spirit (Gal 5:25; Eph 2:18). When the church gathers to worship God the Father through Jesus Christ the Son, it does so "in the Spirit" (Rom 8:26-27). It calls upon (epiclesis), the Holy Spirit of God to unify and empower it to worship God in a worthy manner, i.e., in union with the worship of Jesus Christ (L.G., 7; S.C., 6).

Christian worship has a twofold thrust or direction: at once it is oriented towards communion with God, and it works to sanctify the individual worshipper as well as the whole community that worships. It should have the effect, then, of developing union with others, koinonia, for the glory of God from whom it begins and towards whom it moves (S.C., 8, 48).

Worship, by its very nature, imposes an ethic upon us: if we are to be at all sincere, we must live in accordance with the demand that our lives be motivated by love as God's life is (2 Cor 5:14). Christian worship has practical repercussions far beyond any place or time in which we engage in it. It constrains us also to work for the spread of God's kingdom in such ways as will be just and fair to all, bringing harmony and integrity not only in relation to ourselves and to others but also to our environment and to all creation.

See Liturgy and Christian life; Adoration, theology of

J.D. Crichton, "A Theology of Worship" in Jones, Wainwright and Yarnold, The Study of Liturgy (London: S.P.C.K., 1978). L. Bouyer, Rite and Man (Burns & Oates, 1963). C. Vagaggini, Theological Dimensions of the Liturgy (Collegeville, 1959).

PATRICK BISHOP, S.J.

YOUNG ADULTS, LITURGY FOR

The following article is not based on theory, but rather on years of experience with young adults, principally of high school age. It offers ten principles or words of pastoral advice for any who would do ministry in general, and liturgical ministry in particular, for this specific age group.

(1) Presume Disinterest, if not outright hostility. That way, you will be reaching the receptivities of everyone in your youth congregation—from those who would rather feed their parents to piranhas than be at your Mass, to those who yearn for martyrdom. The former will outnumber the latter by a million to one. Remember that you are offering worship to young people who have been baptized without having gone through any real inner conversion. You are offering Mass for people whose career choices (in all but a few cases) will be in no way affected by their being Christians; their motives are no different from those of a well-intentioned atheist or pagan. They are by no means bad kids; they are just not yet genuinely, internally Christian.

To test out that last, seemingly cynical remark, ask a group of young people to respond to the following: if someone reliable were to offer you a full college scholarship and a $75,000 job for which you had only to go on TV with the other recipients and deny your belief in Jesus Christ, what would you do? The results are sobering, but if we deal with our young where we would like to think they are, rather than where they really are, we are fools shouting gibberish into the maelstrom.

Psychologist Jerome Bruner said you can teach anything, to anyone, anyplace in his or her development, in a meaningful way, provided you can adapt the message to their receptivities.

(2) Adol-escence. The word is inchoative; it means a process has begun but is still continuing, as in "convalescence." They are physically capable of producing children, and yet they are not yet adult enough to be parents. Contrary to the facts, parents think adulthood (and the time to treat their young as more than children) clicks on like a thermostat at midnight of the twenty-first birthday, while the youngsters think adulthood clicked on the moment puberty occurred. Neither "side" realizes the difference between being "grown-up" and being "adult." The one happens without either the cooperation or permission of the victim; the other happens only through a long, active process of learning, suffering, and deciding. Of all the natures in the universe we know of, only human adulthood is an invitation and not an ineluctable command. Unlike any other species, we are free not to be human—to vegetate, to act like beasts. This is the invitation we have to offer our young: to become truly human, before they can even comprehend our invitation to Christianity. Grace builds on nature, not the other way around.

The personally validated adult self is one's character. And the Greek word for "character" is ethos: ethic. Until one painfully evolves a personal ethic, there is no character, only an entity with a certain personality. The individual's soul is merely a hodge-podge of "do's" and "don't's" taped on his or her superego from hundreds of contradictory sources: parents, media, teachers, peers, music. Sorting out all those voices and determining which are true and which are corrosive takes a great deal of effort—which is something teenagers by nature are loath to do, fed up as they are with a soul-less, efficient, left-brain education which seems to them to have no relevance whatever to the dog-eat-dog world they're preparing themselves for. What's more, they get little help from us. Those who go to public schools get no training in ethics—in character—but rather some vague sense of "values," lest the school be accused of teaching religion. Even those who go to Catholic schools get little training in psychology—which is an adolescent's principal problem—but instead a list of rules which, to them, seem sheerly arbitrary, from a church which seems, again to them, interested almost exclusively in keeping people from enjoying sex. "Be honest, be chaste, be committed; it's good for you" is about as real a motivation as "the spinach is good for you." Sez who?

We are all human, and so we are all alike. But each of us is a self, and so no two of us are alike. First, we have to show the teenage audience at our liturgies that being ethical (that is, acting humanly) is in fact good for them—in ways they acknowledge are in fact good. The human species has all the qualities of the lower species, and yet only we can know and love and grow in our ability to know and love. Just as Labrador retrievers wag their tails, even when they're exhausted from chasing sticks, so we are fulfilled when we know and love and grow. Easy enough to prove: do you really feel peachy-terrific when you yield to the blahs, to senioritis, to feeling sorry for yourself? Why not? Because it's unnatural. You weren't born to be a vegetable or a beaten cur.

A step further: we share being human, and the more we lower our self-defensive barriers, the more humanly enriched we become. We all fear the same things, yearn for the same things, suffer the same inertia, the same temptation to yield principle in return for acceptance. "Ice-breakers," methods for breaking down barriers are legion; we should use them more, even in place of a homily. Feeling that human sense of belonging beneath the surface defensive cocoons is far more important than hearing about it.

Still further, we must then help each youngster to focus in a bit closer on who he or she is as a unique individual. One hopes that the process of self-discovery goes on for a lifetime, but many go to their graves never having had anything but the slightest notion of who they were, no sense of a coherent storyline, only a list of unrelated problems endured. Again, there are many instruments available to help teenagers discover at least what type of persons they are not (the Enneagram, the Myers-Briggs Type Indicator)—and therefore the goals they can set aside as unrealistic. They can then direct their energies to making a difference with the unique combination of talents each one is.

Until each youngster can get at least a temporary, tenuous grasp on who-I-am, how can we ever expect them to make anything out of who they are? Far more important, how can we tell them, "unless you lose yourself, you will never find yourself"? How can they lose what they've never really grasped? How can they forget a self which is so incessantly confusing? Grace builds on nature.

(3) Don't Be Taken in By the Surface "Cool." Whether the mask is macho, or Gidget-sweet, or bland to the point of anonymity, until the teenager has some realistic sense of self, there's a lot of tension and turmoil going on behind the mask. Each of them is, on the one hand, cocksure they will live as well as their parents within ten years of college graduation (egotism), and yet at the same time deadly sure that everybody's out to get them (paranoia), both of which contraries add up to the classical definition of narcissism. It is impossible to sell either genuine love or genuine faith to an egotist or a paranoid or a narcissist. Cool and defensive masks are the precise opposite of the vulnerability requisite for both.

Many religious educators believe youngsters' main concern is with sex. More likely, sexual expression is merely an ersatz way to find a self-value mirrored back from seeming total acceptance by someone else. They struggle against the genuinely felt pull of principle and commitment from the one side, and the pull of adaptability, acceptance by others, and "keeping an open mind" from the other side. Again, as with sex, without a personally accepted sense of self, "belonging" looks like a good substitute until a sense of self "happens along."

There are many corollary obstacles springing up within the teenager from that inadequate sense of self and the fear of risk which that lack of self-trust engenders.

They at least seem impervious to symbols. Years ago, faith fed on and was fed by an unlimited menagerie of symbols: medals, rosaries, summer schools of Catholic action, benedictions, knights of the Blessed Sacrament, May crownings. No kid today would be caught dead with a scapular! For the moment, even varsity letter sweaters seem to be "out." I have asked young men if they were ever brought to tears by a film; one or two say "Elephant Man" or the end of "Ordinary People." But the rest had either never had that bittersweet fellow-feeling or, if they had, were too embarrassed to admit it. Pose yourself a problem then, perhaps for a homily-substitute: what symbols still genuinely have meaning to them? Which ones are adaptable to liturgy?

They seem impervious to tradition. Nothing truly meaningful happened before they came on the scene. Show them "Fiddler on the Roof," and ask them if they have any sense whatever what was going on inside Tevye when his daughter married a Gentile and he refused ever to speak to her again. Show them the film of John Kennedy's funeral and ask what the traditions and symbols were trying to "say," how they were trying to purge grief. Pose a problem to them and to yourself, then: what traditions are still meaningful? Which ones can we use?

In the same vein, they seem impervious to honest hero-worship, which is another act of vulnerability and awe in an age where such things seem very uncool and naive. Several boys have said to me that their true heroes were both Mother Teresa and Donald Trump—and they really meant it! They want, at one and the same time, to be unassailably rich and unassailably virtuous. A difficult goal. Pose the problem to them and to yourself: if a hero were possible in a world where The National Enquirer delights in debunking heroes, what would he or she be like? Are there people like that still around—perhaps unsung? Are there people like that in history or literature? Do we want to be heroes, somebodies, or to be nobodies, who tread water for a lifetime—and then die? They do want to be somebodies. They're just afraid of the risk.

They also seem—although they definitely are not—impervious to altruism. They will admit that TV and music have had far more of an influence on their values than religion, their teachers, or even their own parents. There, too, their parents are often indifferent to religion, far more interested in their children's material success than in their fulfillment as human beings. There is no way we can uproot those influences which are dyed into our youngsters' psyches. But we can counter-challenge it. Rather than merely telling them about the world's poor, give them something they can do about it: a nursing home, retarded children, soup-kitchens, tutoring—liberate them into responsibility instead of shackling them to sterile and corrosive guilt-trips.

(4) Don't Underestimate Their Capacity for Challenge. Since Vatican II, we have overcompensated for the triumphalism and the severe Great Accountant God. Our hymns are now pastel paeans to the Good Shepherd who strokes and cherishes and never challenges. Banish them from your choir lofts like the Arian heresies they are! There are at least two or three dozen kids in any parish who have bands (of varying quality.) Set them the problem of writing songs that will appeal to the young—spirited and enspiriting but reverent, voicing their problems: loneliness, fear, yearning to be somebody who makes a difference. Precisely the subjects (other than sex) that the rock bands hymn from a pagan point of view. They know where the kids are coming from, and the kids can't get enough of them. We've surely borrowed songs from pagans before and baptized them!

Whatever you do, don't let them think being Christian is easy. It isn't. Don't soft-pedal the gospel where Jesus noted it should be played with all the stops full-out. If there is a single way in which religion classes and homilies have subverted the appeal of Jesus, it is in making him a pushover.

(5) Clarify the Goal. Surely, the goal is not merely to get teenagers to endure Mass. We are trying to bring them to a personal and communal relationship with God. All the religion courses and homilies and liturgies in the world will remain as cold as calculus unless one has a personal commitment to the Person religion is all about. Whipping a boy or girl to church—either with the threat of hell or the threat of being grounded—is like forcing a boy to go to a prom with a homely neighbor. He'll go, all right. But there won't be much communication and very little likelihood of a personal relationship. And he's not likely to ask her out again.

Unless we teach young people to pray—in schools and in retreats—all our other efforts are in vain. And not merely "saying prayers." No, teaching how to short-circuit the calculating intelligence and be at peace, centered, vulnerable—opening up and letting God enter the soul. If we could only effect that, all the rest would take care of itself. Till then, all we're doing is stumbling over our good intentions, turning our best efforts into obstacles instead of inducements.

(6) Be Vulnerable to Them. In 57 years, I can't remember a priest from a pulpit or a lecturer every saying, "When I pray . . ." Only on rare occasions have I heard a priest tell of times when he felt touched by God or furious at God. When I ask young men to ask their parents how they see God, 90 percent of them prefer to guess: "It'd be too much of a hassle; stuff like that's too personal." Are we trying to foist on them a God we seem to have no time for ourselves? As one student said, "I treat God the way I treat my parents' other friends."

Priests and parents talk of honesty, chastity, "getting to" Mass, thrift. All pretty much head-trip stuff. When do they open their souls? When do they make the pain they have suffered wrestling with God bear fruit in lives other than their own? If teenagers are allowed the erroneous idea that their parents and pastors have certitude or that doubt is some kind of sin, we have lost them, because certitude is impossible to fallible human beings and because doubt is the prerequisite of learning.

(7) The Motivation Is Not Fear. Fear of punishment will secure conformity, not faith. Like every teacher, parents and priests ought to be trying to render themselves unnecessary, sure that their young will do freely and knowingly what for a long while they did merely to please or avoid punishment. As becoming-adults, they ought not to be motivated by what would motivate children. When their parents are in nursing homes, they ought not to visit them sheerly because the fourth commandment insists on it. Nor should they visit their Father on Sunday merely because the third commandment enjoins it. For an adult, "salvation" has to mean something more than merely a guarantee against hell.

Until the young have owned the fact of their own inevitable and unpredictable deaths, they will never value the gift of Christianity. Until they realize that, without the reality of an afterlife, we are Beckett's futile clowns, hungering for an answer which will never show up, the core of Christianity is meaningless to them. All their efforts—all their medals and raises and triumphs—are ultimately Monopoly money. As one student put it, "If there is no God, life is an Easter-egg hunt. And there are no Easter eggs." But Jesus is our invitation into forever! Surely, that's something to celebrate.

Gratitude is another motive the young begin to value. If a zillionaire stopped you on the street and said, "You look like a nice kid. Here's a million bucks. No strings. But maybe, if you don't mind, drop around occasionally and we could talk." If you made no attempt to find out who the man was, if you never took time to say thanks, if you only rarely and grudgingly dropped around to see him, you'd be a pretty mean-spirited S.O.B.. But God opened the door to . . . everything.

(8) Small Groups, Not Large. Especially in schools, we get the idea that full-school liturgies are great for giving ourselves a false sense of community. All one has to do is look around and see the hundreds of unmoving lips during the Christmas hymns all the students know and even during the Our Father. The same is true of large parish youth Masses: they're all there; they're all young; but there is no more sense of community than in an airport waiting room. It's merely a congregation of strangers gathered together for their own self-interests. We hunker in our cocoons, certain that everybody in the place is staring at me, when, of course, each of them thinks everybody's staring at him or her.

(9) Community Makes the Liturgy, Not Vice-Versa. All the kids know that. It's a commonplace: "I like the Masses at school but not the ones in my parish." Not that school Masses are better done, nor that the priests are nicer, but that the students know at least some of the people in the school congregation with them; there's at least an inchoate sense of community.

The more pastors and parents can get youngsters to know one another not merely by playing basketball or dancing but by serving together—the better their (small) youth Masses will be. Again, not yet having a sense of self, a teenager simply can't have a truly meaningful liturgy surrounded by a gaggle of intimidating strangers. And which adult has not told youngsters again and again to beware of strangers?

(10) Finally, Remember It's a Celebration! An alien who attended a great many of our Sunday liturgies would hardly report back to home base that he/she had witnessed a celebration. Study what youngsters would honestly call "celebrations": Christmas dinner, birthday parties, parties in general, rock concerts. Granted, many of them might seem a slight too . . . rowdy for worship. And yet didn't Paul face precisely the same problem with his Corinthian enthusiasts? But Paul did not shut down his rowdy charismatics; he subjected them to discernment to see if they were the result of the Holy Spirit or the self-deceptive Evil Spirit. Was this a genuine experience of God, or was it mere self-excitation? Did their enthusiasm bear fruit in the form of people more open-hearted, open-minded, open-handed? Or did it result in gnostic snobbery, exclusivity, and self-righteousness? The rock Masses which our parish bands bring forth will have to face the same impartial discernment.

If it is true that our young are baptized but not yet truly converted, then we must find them where they are and deal with them where they are: good-hearted pagans. We have to use means and motives that are meaningful to them, not those which were meaningful to us when we were young or are meaningful to us now as adults. They are not adults, and they became who they are in a world light-years distant from the 1960s, the 1950s and 1940s.

There is a beautiful Jewish parable, much like the one about the prodigal son. The father shouts to his boy, "At least meet me halfway!" And the boy shouts, "I can't meet you halfway." And the father replies, "Then come as far as you can. And I'll come the rest of the way."

William J. O'Malley, "Mass and Teenagers," America, October 8, 1988. William J. O'Malley, "P.T. Barnum and the Catechetical Quest," America, October 10, 1987. William J. O'Malley, "Selling Faith to Skeptics," America, September 3-10, 1988. William J. O'Malley, "Teenagers and . . . You-Know-What," America, April 15, 1989. William J. O'Malley, "Teenage Spirituality," America, April 29, 1989.

WILLIAM J. O'MALLEY, S.J.

Topical Index

1. The Worshipping Church

(a) Vatican II

- Liturgical reform of Vatican II
Frederick R. McManus ... 1081
- Roman liturgical documents since Vatican II
Austin Flannery, O.P. ... 358
- The liturgical movement (1830-1969)
Virgil C. Funk ... 695
- Liturgical law
John M. Huels, O.S.M. ... 661
- Liturgical texts in English
John R. Page ... 715
- Liturgical books
Frederick R. McManus ... 687

(b) Traditions

- Liturgy in the West: pre-Reformation
John K. Brooks-Leonard ... 1282
- Liturgy in the West: post-Reformation
James F. White ... 1272
- Liturgy in the Eastern churches
Peter E. Fink, S.J. ... 1255

(c) Liturgical renewal

- Liturgical reform in the Reformation churches
David R. Newman ... 1077
- Liturgical reform in the Eastern churches
Stephen Bonian, S.J. ... 1072
- Parish renewal
John J. O'Brien ... 925

2. The Heritage of the Church

(a) History

- History of the eucharist in the early church
Lloyd G. Patterson ... 398

History of the eucharist in the West

Susan J. White ... 416

History of the eucharist in the East

Grant Sperry-White ... 410

History of liturgical reform

German Martinez ... 1066

Modern papacy and liturgical renewal

John H. McKenna, C.M. ... 922

Modern theologians and liturgical renewal

Michael Skelley, S.J. ... 1248

Benedictines and liturgical renewal

Michael Kwatera, O.S.B. ... 129

(b) Sources

Jewish worship

Lawrence A. Hoffman ... 623

Jewish roots of Christian worship

Aidan Kavanagh, O.S.B. ... 617

Early liturgical sources

Lloyd G. Patterson ... 1201

Liturgical sources

Gerard Austin, O.P. ... 1213

3. The Sacramental Life of the Church

(a) Sacraments in general

Sacraments

Bernard Cooke ... 1116

Sacraments in the Reformation churches

Susan J. White ... 1130

Sacraments in the Eastern churches

Michael A. Fahey, S.J. ... 1123

Sacramentals

Patrick Bishop, S.J. ... 1114

Word and sacrament

Andrew Ciferni, O. Praem. ... 1318

Sacramental character

Patrick Bishop, S.J. ... 176

- Sacramental validity
Peter E. Fink, S.J. ... 1298
- Sacramental records
Joseph L. Cunningham ... 1064

(b) Initiation: baptism/confirmation

- (i) Initiation
 - Christian initiation
Paul F. Bradshaw ... 601
 - Evangelization
Frank DeSiano, C.S.P. ... 464
 - Conversion to faith
Pamela Jackson ... 294
 - Catechumenate
Mary Alice Piil, C.S.J. ... 172
 - Scrutinies
Peter Jeffery ... 1149
 - Mystagogy
Jeffrey P. Baerwald, S.J. ... 881
 - Sponsors for initiation
A. Brandt Henderson ... 1231
 - Renewal of baptismal vows
Charles W. Gusmer ... 126
 - Ritual for adult commitment
Paul Turner ... 28
- (ii) Baptism
 - Theology of baptism
Edward J. Yarnold, S.J. ... 115
 - Baptism in scripture
Daniel J. Harrington, S.J. ... 83
 - History of baptism
Daniel B. Stevick ... 90
 - Ecclesial nature of baptism
Marg. Mary Kelleher, O.S.U. ... 87
 - Symbols in baptism
Pamela Jackson ... 108
 - Baptismal formulae in East and West
Ruth C. Duck ... 123
 - Baptism and original sin
Paul Turner ... 81
 - Exorcism in the baptismal rite
Paul Turner ... 466
 - Infant baptism
Richard J. Butler ... 96
 - Parents in infant baptism
Paul F.X. Covino ... 101
 - Ministers of baptism

- Mary Alice Piil, C.S.J.* ... 102
- Modes of administering baptism
Daniel B. Stevick ... 106
- Times for baptism
Paul F.X. Covino ... 122

(iii) Confirmation

- Theology of confirmation
Frank C. Quinn, O.P. ... 273
- Confirmation in scripture
Thomas A. Marsh ... 252
- History of confirmation
Thomas A. Marsh ... 260
- Post-baptismal anointing
Jean C. Zeidler ... 56
- Baptism in the Holy Spirit
Barbara Finan ... 539
- Ministers of confirmation
A. Brandt Henderson ... 267
- Preparation for confirmation
A. Brandt Henderson ... 270

(c) Eucharist

- Theology of the eucharist
Peter E. Fink, S.J. ... 431
- Eucharist in scripture
Stanley B. Marrow, S.J. ... 393
- Eucharistic prayers
John Barry Ryan ... 451
- Eucharistic worship outside Mass
Everett A. Diederich, S.J. ... 459
- Theology of adoration
John H. McKenna, C.M. ... 25
- Ministers of the eucharist
Peter E. Fink, S.J. ... 422
- Reformation controversies on the eucharist
Hughes Oliphant Old ... 425
- Body of Christ
Marg. Mary Kelleher, O.S.U. ... 135
- Reconciliation and eucharist
Doris Donnelly ... 391
- Names for the eucharistic liturgy
Frank C. Senn ... 448
- Agape
Frank C. Senn ... 39
- Anaphora
Frank C. Senn ... 46
- Covenant
Richard J. Clifford, S.J. ... 297

- Anamnesis
Frank C. Senn ... 45
- Epiclesis
Frank C. Senn ... 390
- Sacrifice
Robert J. Daly, S.J. ... 1135
- Reservation of the eucharist
Peter E. Fink, S.J. ... 429
- Communion service
Frank C. Senn ... 237
- Communion under both kinds
John M. Huels, O.S.M. ... 240
- Modes of distribution of the chalice
John M. Huels, O.S.M. ... 175
- Children and the eucharist
John J. O'Brien, C.P. ... 184
- Frequency of reception of communion
Frank C. Senn ... 241

(d) Order and orders

- Church order
David N. Power, O.M.I. ... 212
- Ministry
Joseph M. Powers, S.J. ... 828
- Sacrament of orders
Patrick McGoldrick ... 896
- Ordination rites
Alan F. Detscher ... 915
- Symbols of orders
Alan F. Detscher ... 908
- Priesthood
Donald L. Gelpi, S.J. ... 1013
- Pastoral administrator
J. Frank Henderson ... 933
- Team ministry
Dody H. Donnelly ... 844
- Lay ministry
Virginia S. Finn ... 673
- Women in ministry
Miriam D. Ukeritis, C.S.J. ... 848
- Ordination of women
George H. Tavard ... 910

(e) Marriage

- Sacrament of marriage
Michael G. Lawler ... 805
- Liturgy of marriage
Joseph M. Champlin ... 796
- Ministers of marriage

- James A. Schmeiser* ... 801
- Music at weddings
Elaine J. Rendler ... 1317
- Preparation for marriage
Joseph M. Champlin ... 803
- Renewal of marriage vows
James A. Schmeiser ... 775
- Ecumenical marriage
John F. Hotchkin ... 791
- Canonical issues concerning marriage
Joseph J. Koury, S.J. ... 776
- Church and civil marriage
James A. Schmeiser ... 789
- Marriage tribunal
John M. Huels, O.S.M. ... 773
- Ministry to the divorced
Christopher P. Witt, C.S.P. ... 344

(f) Reconciliation

- Sacrament of reconciliation
James Dallen ... 1052
- Liturgies of reconciliation
Peter E. Fink, S.J. ... 1043
- Theology of forgiveness
Catherine Dooley, O.P. ... 473
- Order of penitents
Robert H. Blondell ... 945
- Non-sacramental penance services
Robert H. Blondell ... 936
- Ministers of reconciliation
Doris Donnelly ... 1050
- Experience of sin
Seán Fagan, S.M. ... 1190
- Conversion from sin
Andrew L. Nelson ... 290
- Priority of human conscience
Andrew L. Nelson ... 285
- Internal forum
Ladislav Örsy, S.J. ... 615
- Penance and reconciliation
M. Francis Mannion ... 934
- Reconciliation and priesthood
Walter J. Woods ... 1034
- Confession of sins
Joseph L. Cunningham ... 245
- Contrition
Joseph L. Cunningham ... 289
- Confidentiality
Edward Collins Vacek, S.J. ... 247

- Reformation of life
 - Joseph L. Cunningham* ... 1097
- Satisfaction
 - Joseph L. Cunningham* ... 1143
- Absolution
 - Joseph L. Cunningham* ... 11
- General absolution
 - Peter E. Fink, S.J.* ... 12
- Children and first penance
 - Daniel P. Grigassy, O.F.M.* ... 187
- Reconciliation and spiritual direction
 - David L. Fleming, S.J.* ... 1037
- Reconciliation and therapy
 - William A. Barry, S.J.* ... 1039

(g) Sacrament of the sick

- Pastoral care of the sick
 - Jennifer Glen, C.C.V.I.* ... 1167
- Christian view of sickness
 - Lucien J. Richard, O.M.I.* ... 1186
- Suffering
 - Lucien J. Richard, O.M.I.* ... 1234
- Healing
 - Lucien J. Richard, O.M.I.* ... 520
- Pastoral presence
 - Gerald J. Calhoun, S.J.* ... 1003
- Ministers in the sacrament of the sick
 - James M. Schellman* ... 1182
- Ministry of the sick
 - James M. Schellman* ... 1165
- Communion to the sick
 - Charles W. Gusmer* ... 1164
- Communal anointing of the sick
 - Charles W. Gusmer* ... 1162
- Frequency of anointing of the sick
 - James M. Schellman* ... 1161
- Viaticum
 - Charles W. Gusmer* ... 1314

(h) Christian burial

- Christian burial
 - Julia Upton, R.S.M.* ... 140
- Theology of death
 - Lucien J. Richard, O.M.I.* ... 324
- Preaching at funerals
 - Perry H. Biddle, Jr.* ... 487
- Ministry at the time of death
 - Gerald J. Calhoun, S.J.* ... 319
- Children and death
 - Walter J. Smith, S.J.* ... 177

- Death of children
 - Walter J. Smith, S.J.* ... 181

4. The Church at Prayer

(a) General liturgical acts

- Worship
 - Patrick Bishop, S.J.* ... 1331
- Liturgy
 - Lawrence J. Madden, S.J.* ... 740
- Assembly
 - John J. Gallen, S.J.* ... 71
- Cult of the saints
 - Michael S. Driscoll* ... 1137
- Anointing
 - James L. Empereur, S.J.* ... 49
- Hospitality
 - Willy Malarcher* ... 558
- Reverence
 - Peter E. Fink, S.J.* ... 1098

(b) Forms of prayer

- Liturgy of the hours
 - Stanislaus Campbell, F.S.C.* ... 562
- Types of prayer in the liturgy
 - Kathleen Hughes, R.S.C.J.* ... 959
- Psalms as liturgical prayer
 - Richard J. Clifford, S.J.* ... 1024
- Eucharistic prayers
 - John Barry Ryan* ... 451
- Eucharistic worship outside Mass
 - Everett A. Diederich, S.J.* ... 459
- Doxology
 - Arlo D. Duba* ... 365
- Popular devotions
 - Carl Dehne, S.J.* ... 331
- The Lord's Prayer
 - Michael Downey* ... 768
- Praying the creed
 - Michael Downey* ... 303
- Gathering rites
 - Kenneth Hannon, O.M.I.* ... 491
- Penitential rite at Mass
 - Daniel P. Grigassy, O.F.M.* ... 944

(c) Proclaiming the word

- Theology of the word
 - Kathleen Cannon, O.P.* ... 1323
- Theology of preaching
 - Mary Catherine Hilkert, O.P.* ... 996

- Scripture in the liturgy
Andrew Ciferni, O. Praem. ... 1144
- Liturgy of the word
Andrew Ciferni, O. Praem. ... 1320
- Preaching the scriptures
Daniel J. Harrington, S.J. ... 983
- Homily
Robert P. Waznak, S.S. ... 552
- Liturgical ministry of preaching
John Allyn Melloh, S.M. ... 991
- Preaching as art and craft
Walter J. Burghardt, S.J. ... 967
- Preaching the lectionary
Perry H. Biddle, Jr. ... 978
- Catholic preaching in the U.S.
Mary Lyons ... 986
- Special occasion preaching
James Wallace, C.S.S.R. ... 994
- Preaching by lay persons
James Wallace, C.S.S.R. ... 975
- (d) Presiding at prayer
 - Ministry of presiding
John J. O'Brien, C.P. ... 1010
 - Presidential style
James L. Empereur, S.J. ... 1006
 - Lay leadership in the liturgy
John J. O'Brien, C.P. ... 669
- (e) Liturgical ministries
 - Liturgical lay ministries
J. Frank Henderson ... 670
 - Installation of ministers
J. Frank Henderson ... 612
 - Ministers of the eucharist
Peter E. Fink, S.J. ... 422
 - Music ministries
Edward J. McKenna ... 852
 - Liturgical committees
Ronald J. Lewinski ... 691
 - Liturgical director
Ronald J. Lewinski ... 694
- (f) Liturgical time
 - Liturgical calendar
Thomas J. Talley ... 150
 - Theology of liturgical time
John Allyn Melloh, S.M. ... 733
 - Lent
Lizette Larson-Miller ... 680
- Liturgies of Holy Week
John F. Baldovin, S.J. ... 542
- Easter season
Richard N. Fragomeni ... 375
- Christmas season
Lizette Larson-Miller ... 204
- Feasts of Christ
Brian O. McDermott, S.J. ... 200
- Feasts of Mary
Brian E. Daley, S.J. ... 818
- Feasts of angels
Peter Jeffery ... 47
- Feasts of apostles
Michael Witczak ... 57
- Feasts of evangelists
Michael Witczak ... 462
- Trinity Sunday
Catherine Mowry LaCugna ... 1296
- Feast of All Saints
Michael Witczak ... 41
- Feast of All Souls
Michael Witczak ... 42
- Feasts of John the Baptist
Michael Witczak ... 633
- Feasts of Joseph
Michael Witczak ... 634
- Penitential days
Daniel P. Grigassy, O.F.M. ... 939
- (g) Spirituality
 - Liturgical prayer
Louis Weil ... 949
 - Liturgical spirituality
S. Shawn Madigan, C.S.J. ... 1224
 - Lay spirituality
Eileen Burke-Sullivan ... 1224
 - Priestly spirituality
Richard J. Hauser, S.J. ... 1018
 - Penitential practices
Seán Fagan, S.M. ... 941
 - Spiritual direction and liturgy
David L. Fleming, S.J. ... 1220
- (h) Special liturgical issues
 - Liturgical catechesis
Gilbert Ostiediek, O.F.M. ... 163
 - Ecumenism and the liturgy
Teresa Berger ... 385
 - Liturgical formation
Emmanuel Cutrone ... 480

(i) Special communities of prayer

- Children
 - James A. Wilde* ... 191
- College campus
 - Lawrence J. Madden, S.J.* ... 233
- Persons with disabilities
 - Madeleine B. Provost* ... 340
- Marginalized
 - Michael Downey* ... 771
- Ministry school
 - Thomas Richstatter, O.F.M.* ... 837
- Young adults
 - William J. O'Malley, S.J.* ... 1332

5. The Church and the Arts(a) General

- Liturgical aesthetics
 - Don E. Saliers* ... 30
- Ritual
 - George S. Worgul* ... 1101
- Imagination and worship
 - Peter E. Fink, S.J.* ... 587
- Ritual as communication
 - Sharon Daloz Parks* ... 235
- Liturgical creativity
 - Ruth C. Duck* ... 302

(b) Music

- Liturgical music
 - Edward Foley, O.F.M. Cap.* ... 854
- Styles of liturgical music
 - Robert R. Grimes, S.J.* ... 870
- Types of liturgical music
 - Edward J. McKenna* ... 876

(c) Art and environment

- Liturgical art
 - Marchita B. Mauck* ... 66
- Liturgical architecture
 - Mary M. Schaefer* ... 59
- Liturgical vestments
 - John D. Laurance, S.J.* ... 1305
- Sacred vessels
 - T. Jerome Overbeck, S.J.* ... 1300
- Altar
 - Dennis McNally, S.J.* ... 43
- Baptistry
 - Dennis McNally, S.J.* ... 127

- Reconciliation room
 - T. Jerome Overbeck, S.J.* ... 1042
- Cross
 - T. Jerome Overbeck, S.J.* ... 304
- Uses of incense
 - Richard N. Fragomeni* ... 594
- Housing for sacred oils
 - Dennis McNally, S.J.* ... 896
- Eucharistic chapel
 - T. Jerome Overbeck, S.J.* ... 447

(d) Movement and gesture

- Gesture and movement in liturgy
 - Thomas A. Krosnicki, S.V.D.* ... 494
- Liturgical gestures
 - Robert F. VerEecke, S.J.* ... 503
- Liturgical dance
 - Carla DeSola* ... 314
- Liturgical drama
 - Martha Ann Kirk, C.C.V.I.* ... 369

(e) Language and symbol

- Liturgical language
 - Mary Collins, O.S.B.* ... 651
- Language and human experience
 - Joyce A. Zimmerman, C.P.P.S.* ... 644
- Symbol
 - Stephen Happel* ... 1237
- Liturgical role of silence
 - Michael Downey* ... 1189
- Images of God in liturgy
 - Kathryn Ann Piccard* ... 513
- Inclusive language
 - Janet Walton* ... 596

6. The Reflecting Church(a) General theological questions

- Liturgical theology
 - Kevin W. Irwin* ... 721
- Liturgy and doctrine
 - Geoffrey Wainwright* ... 349
- Sacramental theology after Vatican II
 - Peter E. Fink, S.J.* ... 1107
- Sacraments and the human sciences
 - Joseph Martos* ... 576
- Theology of the laity
 - Leonard Doohan* ... 636
- Mystery theology
 - Theresa F. Koernke, I.H.M.* ... 883

Historical research and liturgical renewal
Robert J. Daly, S.J. ... 526

(b) Special theological questions

Christology and liturgy
Brian O. McDermott, S.J. ... 210
 Creation theology and worship
Theodore Runyon ... 299
 Ecclesiology and liturgy
Marg. Mary Kelleher, O.S.U. ... 382
 Feminism and the liturgy
Janet Walton ... 468
 Hermeneutics and worship
Don E. Saliers ... 523
 Holy Spirit in Christian worship
John R. Sachs, S.J. ... 529
 Gifts of the Holy Spirit
Barbara Finan ... 541
 Trinity and liturgy
Catherine Mowry LaCugna ... 1293

7. The Pastoral Mission of the Church

(a) General

Liturgy and Christian life

Enda McDonagh ... 742

Liturgy as prophetic

James B. Dunning ... 753

Liturgy and politics

Walter J. Woods ... 948

Liturgy and social issues

Walter J. Woods ... 1198

(b) Issues of church and culture

Liturgical adaptation

Mark R. Francis, C.S.V. ... 14

Liturgy and culture

M. Francis Mannion ... 307

Liturgy in a technological age

John M. Staudenmaier, S.J. ... 762

Inculturation of the liturgy

J. Peter Schineller, S.J. ... 598

Native American ritual

John S. Hascall, O.F.M.Cap. ... 892

Use of media in the liturgy

Thomas A. Kane, C.S.P. ... 825

Liturgy via television

John Geaney, C.S.P. ... 1246

Secularization and worship

German Martinez ... 1156

Secular rituals

Gregor T. Goethals ... 1150

Contributors

- Gerard Austin, O.P., The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
Jeffrey P. Baerwald, S.J., LeMoyne College, Syracuse, New York
John F. Baldovin, S.J., Jesuit School of Theology, Berkeley, California
William A. Barry, S.J., Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts
Teresa Berger, The Divinity School, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina
Perry H. Biddle, Jr., Presbyterian Minister and Author, Old Hickory, Tennessee
Patrick Bishop, S.J., St. Thomas More College (University of Western Australia), Crawley, Western Australia
Robert H. Blondell, St. Ephrem Parish, Archdiocese of Detroit, Michigan
Stephen J. Bonian, S.J., Pontifical Mission for Palestine, Amman, Jordan
Paul F. Bradshaw, University of Notre Dame, Indiana
John K. Brooks-Leonard, University of Notre Dame, Indiana
Walter J. Burghardt, S.J., Editor-in-chief, Theological Studies, Baltimore, Maryland
Eileen C. Burke-Sullivan, All Saints' Parish, Dallas, Texas
Richard J. Butler, Sacred Heart Parish, Lexington, Massachusetts
Gerald J. Calhoun, S.J., Jesuit Novitiate, Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts
Stanislaus Campbell, F.S.C., St. Mary's College High School, Berkeley, California
Kathleen Cannon, O.P., Catholic Theological Union, Chicago, Illinois
Joseph M. Champlin, St. Joseph's Church, Camillus, New York
Andrew D. Ciferni, O.Praem., The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
Richard J. Clifford, S.J., Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
Mary Collins, O.S.B., The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
Bernard Cooke, College of the Holy Cross, Worcester, Massachusetts
Paul F.X. Covino, Georgetown Center for Liturgy, Spirituality and the Arts, Washington, D.C.
Joseph L. Cunningham, St. Vincent de Paul Regional Seminary, Boynton Beach, Florida

- Emmanuel Cutrone, Spring Hill College, Mobile, Alabama
- Brian E. Daley, S.J., Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- James Dallen, Gonzaga University, Spokane, Washington
- Robert J. Daly, S.J., Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts
- Carl Dehne, S.J., Loyola University, Chicago, Illinois
- Frank P. DeSiano, C.S.P., Director, Parish Based Evangelization, Washington, D.C.
- Carla DeSola, Director, Omega Liturgical Dance Company, New York, New York
- Alan F. Detscher, Associate Director, Secretariat for the Liturgy (N.C.C.B.), Washington, D.C.
- Everett A. Diederich, S.J., Diocese of Fort Wayne-South Bend, Indiana
- Doris Donnelly, John Carroll University, University Heights, Ohio
- Dorothy (Dody) H. Donnelly, S.F. Theol. Sem., Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, California
- Leonard Doohan, Gonzaga University, Spokane, Washington
- Catherine Dooley, O.P., The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- Michael Downey, Loyola Marymount University, Los Angeles, California
- Michael S. Driscoll, Carroll College, Helena, Montana
- Arlo D. Duba, University of Dubuque Theological Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa
- Ruth C. Duck, Garrett-Evangelical Theological Seminary, Evanston, Illinois
- James B. Dunning, North American Forum on the Catechumenate, Arlington, Virginia
- James L. Empereur, S.J., Jesuit School of Theology, Berkeley, California
- Seán Fagan, S.M., Secretary General of the Society of Mary, Rome, Italy
- Michael A. Fahey, S.J., University of St. Michael's College, Toronto, Ontario
- Barbara Finan, Ohio Dominican College, Columbus, Ohio
- Peter E. Fink, S.J., Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Virginia Sullivan Finn, Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Austin Flannery, O.P., President, Dominican Publications, Dublin, Ireland
- David L. Fleming, S.J., Review for Religious, St. Louis, Missouri
- Edward Foley, O.F.M., Cap., Catholic Theological Union, Chicago, Illinois
- Richard N. Fragomeni, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- Mark R. Francis, C.S.V., Catholic Theological Union, Chicago, Illinois
- Virgil C. Funk, National Association of Pastoral Musicians, Washington, D.C.

- John Gallen, S.J., Corpus Christi Center, Phoenix, Arizona
- John Geaney, C.S.P., Director, Intercommunity Telecommunications Project, Silver Spring, Maryland
- Donald L. Gelpi, S.J., Jesuit School of Theology, Berkeley, California
- Jennifer Glen, C.C.V.I., University of St. Thomas School of Theology, Houston, Texas
- Gregor T. Goethals, Rhode Island School of Design, Providence, Rhode Island
- Daniel P. Grigassy, O.F.M., Christ the King Seminary, East Aurora, New York
- Robert R. Grimes, S.J., University of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania
- Charles W. Gusmer, Immaculate Conception Seminary, Seton Hall University, South Orange, New Jersey
- Kenneth Hannon, O.M.I., Oblate School of Theology, San Antonio, Texas
- Stephen Happel, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- Daniel J. Harrington, S.J., Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- John S. Hascall O.F.M., Cap., St. Charles Mission, Pryor, Montana
- Richard J. Hauser, S.J., Creighton University, Omaha, Nebraska
- A. Brandt Henderson, The Church of Our Lady of Sorrows, Sharon, Massachusetts
- J. Frank Henderson, University of Alberta, Edmonton, Alberta
- Mary Catherine Hilkert, O.P., Aquinas Institute of Theology, St. Louis, Missouri
- Lawrence A. Hoffman, The Hebrew Union College—Jewish Institute of Religion, New York
- John F. Hotchkin, Executive Director, Secretariat for Ecumenical and Inter-religious Affairs (N.C.C.B.), Washington, D.C.
- John M. Huels, O.S.M., Catholic Theological Union, Chicago, Illinois
- Kathleen Hughes, R.S.C.J., Catholic Theological Union, Chicago, Illinois
- Kevin W. Irwin, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- Pamela Jackson, Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts
- Peter Jeffery, University of Delaware, Wilmington, Delaware
- Thomas A. Kane, C.S.P., Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Aidan Kavanagh, O.S.B., The Divinity School, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut
- Margaret Mary Kelleher, O.S.U., The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

- Martha Ann Kirk, C.C.V.I., Incarnate Word College, San Antonio, Texas
- Theresa Koernke, University of Notre Dame, Indiana
- Joseph J. Koury, S.J., Weston School of Theology and Boston College: Institute of Pastoral Ministry, Massachusetts
- Thomas A. Krosnicki, S.V.D., Washington Theological Union, Silver Spring, Maryland
- Michael Kwatera, O.S.B., St. John's Abbey, Collegeville, Minnesota
- Catherine Mowry LaCugna, University of Notre Dame, Indiana
- Lizette Larson-Miller, Jesuit School of Theology, Berkeley, California
- John D. Laurance, S.J., Creighton University, Omaha, Nebraska
- Michael G. Lawler, Creighton University, Omaha, Nebraska
- Ronald J. Lewinski, Director, Office for Divine Worship, Archdiocese of Chicago, Illinois
- Mary E. Lyons, Franciscan School of Theology, Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, California
- Lawrence J. Madden, S.J., Georgetown University, Washington, D.C.
- S. Shawn Madigan, C.S.J., College of St. Catherine, St. Paul, Minnesota
- Willy Malarcher, (Deacon), Liturgical Design Consultant, Englewood, New Jersey
- M. Francis Mannion, The Cathedral of the Madeleine, Salt Lake City, Utah
- Stanley B. Marrow, S.J., Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Thomas Marsh, St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, Ireland
- German M. Martinez, Fordham University, Bronx, New York
- Joseph Martos, Allentown College of St. Francis de Sales, Center Valley, Pennsylvania
- Marchita B. Mauck, Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, Louisiana
- Brian O. McDermott, S.J., Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Enda McDonagh, St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, Ireland
- Patrick McGoldrick, St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, Ireland
- Edward J. McKenna, Editor, The Collegeville Hymnal, Collegeville, Minnesota
- John H. McKenna, C.M., St. John's University, Jamaica, New York
- Frederick R. McManus, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- Dennis McNally, S.J., St. Joseph's University, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania
- John Allyn Melloh, S.M., University of Notre Dame, Indiana

- Andrew L. Nelson, Saint Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, Wisconsin
- David R. Newman, Emmanuel College, Toronto, Ontario
- John J. O'Brien, C.P., Catholic Theological Union, Chicago, Illinois
- Hughes Oliphant Old, Center for Theological Inquiry, Princeton, New Jersey
- William J. O'Malley, S.J., Fordham Preparatory School, Bronx, New York
- Ladislav Örsy, S.J., The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- Gilbert Ostdieck, O.F.M., Catholic Theological Union, Chicago, Illinois
- T. Jerome Overbeck, S.J., Loyola University, Chicago, Illinois
- John R. Page, International Commission on English in the Liturgy, Washington, D.C.
- Sharon Daloz Parks, Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Lloyd G. Patterson, Episcopal Divinity School, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Kathryn Ann Piccard, priest of the Episcopal Diocese of Massachusetts, Dorchester, Massachusetts
- Mary Alice Piil, C.S.J., Seminary of the Immaculate Conception, Huntington, New York
- David N. Power, O.M.I., The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.
- Joseph M. Powers, S.J., Jesuit School of Theology, Berkeley, California
- Madeleine B. Provost, Bureau for Exceptional Children and Adults, Diocese of Springfield, Massachusetts
- Frank Currier Quinn, O.P., Aquinas Institute of Theology, St. Louis, Missouri
- Elaine J. Rendler, Georgetown University, Washington D.C.
- Lucien Richard, O.M.I., Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Thomas Richstatter, O.F.M., St. Meinrad School of Theology, Indiana
- Theodore Runyon, Candler School of Theology, (Emory University), Atlanta, Georgia
- John Barry Ryan, Manhattan College, Riverdale, New York
- John R. Sachs, S.J., Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Don E. Saliers, Candler School of Theology, (Emory University), Atlanta, Georgia
- Mary M. Schaefer, Atlantic School of Theology, Halifax, Nova Scotia
- James M. Schellman, International Commission on English in the Liturgy, Washington, D.C.
- J. Peter Schineller, S.J., Nigeria-Ghana Mission, Surulere, Lagos State, Nigeria
- James A. Schmeiser, King's College, University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario, Canada

- Frank C. Senn, Lutheran Church of the Holy Spirit, Lincolnshire, Illinois
- Michael F. Skelley, S.J., Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin
- Walter J. Smith, S.J., Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Grant Sperry-White, Doctoral Candidate, University of Notre Dame, Indiana
- John M. Staudenmaier, S.J., The University of Detroit, Michigan
- Daniel Stevick, Episcopal Divinity School, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Thomas J. Talley, The General Theological Seminary, New York, New York
- George H. Tavard, Methodist Theological School, Ohio
- Paul Turner, St. John Francis Regis Church, Kansas City, Missouri
- Miriam D. Ukeritis, C.S.J., Boston University, Boston, Massachusetts
- Julia Upton, R.S.M., St. John's University, Jamaica, New York
- Edward Collins Vacek, S.J., Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts
- Robert Ver Eecke, S.J., Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Massachusetts
- Geoffrey Wainwright, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina
- James A. Wallace, C.S.S.R., Washington Theological Union, Silver Spring, Maryland
- Janet R. Walton, Union Theological Seminary, New York, New York
- Robert P. Waznak, S.S., Washington Theological Union, Silver Spring, Maryland
- Louis Weil, Church Divinity School of the Pacific, Berkeley, California
- James F. White, University of Notre Dame, Indiana
- Susan J. White, Westcott House, Cambridge, England
- James A. Wilde, Editor, Liturgy Training Publications, Archdiocese of Chicago, Illinois
- Michael G. Witczak, St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee, Wisconsin
- Christopher Witt, C.S.P., North American Conference of Separated and Divorced Catholics
- Walter J. Woods, St. John's Seminary, Brighton, Massachusetts
- George S. Worgul, Jr., Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania
- Edward J. Yarnold, S.J., Campion Hall, Oxford, United Kingdom
- Jean C. Zeidler, Pastor in the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, Luthersburg, Pennsylvania
- Joyce Ann Zimmerman, C.P.P.S., St. Paul University, Ottawa, Ontario

The Editor

Peter E. Fink, S.J. teaches sacramental theology at Weston School of Theology in Cambridge, Massachusetts. He is a graduate of Fordham University in physics; Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in natural science; he studied theology at Woodstock College; and he holds a doctorate in systematic theology from Emory University. He has concentrated his research in sacramental and liturgical studies, and is widely respected for his learning, clarity and innovative thinking in his chosen fields.

